

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

except such as he might be enabled to obtain by his profession or literary talents, the term of his apprenticeship was no sooner expired than he resolved to visit London, where he hoped to acquire for himself that independence which fortune had denied him: it was not, however, without some feeling of anger that he regarded the conduct of his grandfather in leaving him thus unprovided for; and the resentment to which he gave way on this account induced him to represent the venerable commissary under the character of the tyrannical old judge in 'Roderic Random.'

On his arrival in London, Smollett lost no time in presenting his tragedy to one of the managers of the great theatres; but all his efforts to bring it on the stage proving abortive, he was compelled to look abroad for more substantial means of support, and he soon after obtained an appointment as surgeon's mate on board of a man-of-war, forming part of the fleet destined for the unfortunate expedition to Carthage. Thither accordingly he arrived in 1741, disgusted with his occupations and voyage, the privations and sufferings of which are briefly though graphically described in his 'Roderic Random,' and afterwards in a more circumstantial narrative in his 'Compendium of Voyages,' published in 1756. How he employed his time during this residence in the West Indies is not recorded; but he formed an attachment while there with a Miss Lascelles, whom he afterwards married.

On his return to London in 1746, he was desirous of establishing himself in his profession, though he still yielded to the fascinations of his early pursuits; and the poet appeared far more conspicuous than the physician. He now again tried his fortune with the theatres, and produced an opera called 'Alceste,' which was accepted at Covent-garden ; but before it could appear he had quarrelled with Rich, the manager, and published two satires, entitled 'Advice and Reproof,' in which some of the most pungent lines which his pen could produce were directed against that gentleman. By these means Smollett not only injured himself, by rendering it doubtful whether he was sufficiently steady in his profession to become a safe adviser, but created a host of enemies in the very circle, which, with good management, might have afforded him profitable patients.

Notwithstanding all the discouragements he met with in his professional and literary expectations, he married soon after the publication of the satire above-mentioned. The imprudence, however, of this step, was less in appearance than it soon proved. Miss Lascelles was in the expectation of a fortune of £3000 ; and with this sum our author hoped to pursue his career under more favourable circumstances : but, to his no slight disappointment, the expected inheritance depended on a disputed right ; and the legal measures which he now found it necessary to pursue produced no other result than that of involving him in fresh difficulties.

In this emergency, our author resolved to attempt a species of writing more congenial to his genius, and in 1748 he produced his first work of fiction, the admirable novel of 'Roderic Random,' which at once established his reputation as a novelist. In the following year he published his tragedy of 'The Regicide,' the preface to which contains an exaggerated detail of the injustice he had received from the managers by the repeated postponements of its representation, and especially from Mr. Garrick. His want of discretion in this vituperative address he had afterwards reason to regret. In the summer of the year following the publication of his tragedy he went to Paris, where he became intimately acquainted with his biographer Dr. Moore, who accompanied him in some of his excursions. While in France he wrote his 'Adventures of Peregrine Pickle,' which was published in 1751: the 'Memoirs of a Lady of Quality,' (Lady Vane,) contributed to render this work so attractive that a large impression was instantly sold in England and Ireland; while the impatience for its appearance in France rendered the translation of it almost as popular in that country as the original in this.

It was about the period of the publication of this last volume that he again determined to resume his profession; and having obtained the degree of M.D. from a foreign university, he published a little work intitled 'An Essay on the external use of Water, with remarks on the present method of using the mineral waters at Bath,' &c. This production, which is said to have contributed to his reputation as a man of science, and is the only professional work he is known to have written, failed to raise his reputation as a physician; and he soon after its appearance took a house at Chelsea, and devoted himself exclusively to the profession of a man of letters.

In 1753 he published his 'Adventures of Count Fathom,' and in 1755 his translation of 'Don Quixote,' for which he had obtained a large subscription. The completion of this work enabled him to seek a temporary relief from his incessant occupations; and he gladly availed himself of the opportunity afforded him of visiting his mother, who then resided with her daughter, Mrs. Telfer, at Scotstown in Peebleshire, where he passed some time, visiting the scenes of his early recollections and boyish-pastimes.

On his return to England our author engaged to edit the 'Critical Review,' in support of the tories; and the situation in which he was thus placed exposed him to constant annoyances. In 1757 he produced the farce of 'The Reprisal, or the Tars of Old England,' which was accepted by Garrick, to whom he had previously been reconciled; and performed with success at Drury-lane. The intimacy which now subsisted between Smollett and this celebrated performer, had its origin in the justice which he had awarded to his merits in his 'History of England,' the most important if not the most excellent of his productions. This work, which was composed and finished for the press in the short space of fourteen months, is elegant in its style, and generally accurate in its facts. Its sale was remarkably extensive, and the author is said to have cleared by it the sum of £2000. About this period Smollett became involved in several troublesome and expensive litigations, with Drs. Shebbeare, Grainger, and Hill, in consequence of his intemperate invectives in the 'Critical Review:' but the most serious result of these imprudent animadversions was his conviction for a libel on admiral Knowles, of which he avowed himself the author; a confession which exposed him to the penalty of three months' imprisonment in the king's-bench prison, and a fine of £100. During his confinement he is supposed to have written the novel of 'Sir Launcelot Greaves,' in which he has described the character of Theodore, king of Corsica, his fellow-prisoner, with a pathos which adds greatly to the interest of this work, which is perhaps inferior to all his other productions. This novel was first printed in the British Magazine; and afterwards in two volumes, 12mo.

His attention after this appears to have been chiefly occupied for some time in superintending the compilation of a work, intitled 'The Present State of all Nations,' consisting of historical and geographical views of the different countries of the world: he also edited, about the same period, a new impression of Voltaire's works; but in the year 1763, a domestic calamity, the loss of his only daughter, a young lady of fifteen, suspended his literary pursuits, and tended, it is probable, to hasten the termination of his life. In the hope of finding some relief from the melancholy which now preyed on his spirits, he quitted England for three years, during which period he visited France, Germany, and Italy; on his return he proceeded to Scotland, where he found his mother still living. His health and spirits being somewhat restored, he published an account of his journey; and about the same time 'The Adventures of an Atom;' but the feeble hopes which his friends entertained of his recovery soon proved fallacious; and there appeared no chance of his restoration to health, but those arising from a speedy return to a milder climate. Great exertions were accordingly made to procure him an appointment as consul to one of the ports of the Mediterranean, but without success; and, obliged to trust to his own pecuniary resources, he bade adieu to England, whither he was doomed never to return, and proceeded with his wife to Leghorn, in a village near which town, called Monte Nuovo, he fixed his permanent residence. Here he for some time enjoyed sufficient ease to enable him to compose his last, and according to the opinion of many persons, his most admirable production, 'Humphrey Clinker;' soon after the publication of which he expired, October 21st, 1771, at the age of fifty-one.

The excellencies of this admirable writer as a novelist are multifarious and of the highest order. He possessed an inventive genius and a fertile imagination, with an exquisite talent for humour, which, although somewhat too broad and coarse, is lively and pungent: his style is pleasing and clear, his narrative interesting, and the progress of his stories easy and natural. His poetical compositions are so excellent in their kind as to make us regret that they are not more numerous: and while a love of nature prevails among us will always please the reader of taste and sensibility. His 'Ode to Independence' is perhaps the most successful effort of his genius as a poet, and may be ranked with the lyric compositions of Dryden, Akenside, Collins, and Gray.

The 'Continuation of Hume's History of England,' although inferior to its precursor in philosophic spirit and comprehension of views, will nevertheless continue to maintain a high rank in our national literature; and however the unprejudiced reader may occasionally differ from its author in the inferences which he draws and the characters which he estimates, Dr. Smollett will always be regarded as a faithful narrator of historical facts.

Their churches are seized by the catholics, and they are forbid to assemble on pain of death—42. Admiral Herbert worsted by the French fleet in an engagement near Bantry-bay—43. Divers sentences, and attainders reversed in parliament—44. Inquiry into the cause of miscarriages in Ireland—45. Bills passed in this session of parliament.

1. THE constitution of England had now assumed a new aspect: the maxim of hereditary, indefeisible right was at length renounced by a free parliament; the power of the crown was acknowledged to flow from no other fountain than that of a contract with the people; allegiance and protection were declared reciprocal ties depending on each other: the representatives of the nation made a regular claim of rights in behalf of their constituents; and William III. ascended the throne in consequence of an express capitulation with the people: yet, on this occasion, the zeal of the parliament towards their deliverer seems to have overshot their attachment to their own liberty and privileges; or at least they neglected the fairest opportunity that ever occurred to retrench those prerogatives of the crown to which they imputed all the late and former calamities of the kingdom. Their new monarch retained the old regal power over parliaments in its full extent: he was left at liberty to convoke, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve them at his pleasure: he was enabled to influence elections and oppress corporations: he possessed the right of choosing his own council; of nominating all the great officers of the state, and of the household, of the army, the navy, and the church: he reserved the absolute command of the militia: so that he remained master of all the instruments and engines of corruption and violence, without any other restraint than his own moderation, and prudent regard to the claim of rights and principle of resistance, on which the revolution was founded. In a word, the settlement was finished with some precipitation, before the plan had been properly digested and matured; and this will be the case in every establishment formed on a sudden emergency in the face of opposition. It was observed, that the king, who was made by the people, had it in his power to rule without them ; to govern jure divino, though he was created jure humano ; and that, though the change proceeded from a republican spirit, the settlement was built on tory maxims ; for the execution of his government continued still independent of his commission, while his own person remained sacred and inviolable. The prince of Orange had been invited to England by a coalition of parties, united by a common sense of danger : but this tie was no sooner broken, than they flew asunder, and each resumed its original bias : their mutual jealousy and rancor revived, and was heated by dispute into intemperate zeal and enthusiasm : those who at first acted from principles of patriotism were insensibly warmed into partisans ; and king William soon found himself at the head of a faction. As he had been bred a Calvinist, and always expressed an abhorrence of spiritual persecution, the presbyterians and other protestant dissenters considered him as their peculiar protector, and entered into his interests with the most zealous fervor and assiduity : for the same reasons, the friends of the church became jealous of his proceedings, and employed all their influence, first in opposing his elevation to the throne, and afterwards in thwarting his measures : their party was espoused by all the friends of the lineal succession ; by the Roman catholics ; by those who were personally attached to the late king ; and by such as were disgusted by the conduct and personal deportment of William since his arrival in England. They observed, that contrary to his declaration, he had plainly aspired to the crown, and treated his father-in-law with insolence and rigor : that his army contained a number of foreign papists, almost equal to that of the English Roman catholics whom James had employed : that the reports so industriously circulated about the birth of the prince of Wales, the treaty with France for enslaving England, and the murder of the earl of Essex, reports countenanced by the prince of Orange, now appeared to be without foundation : that the Dutch troops remained in London, while the English forces were distributed in remote quarters : that the prince declared the first should be kept about his person, and the latter sent to Ireland : that the two houses, out of complaisance to William, had denied their late sovereign the justice of being heard in his own defence ; and that the Dutch had lately interfered with the trade of London, which was already sensibly diminished. These were the sources of discontent, swelled up by the resentment of some noblemen and other individuals, disappointed in their hopes of profit and preferment.

2. William began his reign with a proclamation,<sup>1</sup> for confirming all protestants in the offices which they enjoyed on the first day of December: then he chose the members of his council, who were generally staunch to his interest, except the archbishop of Canterbury and the earl of Nottingham,<sup>2</sup> and these were admitted in complaisance to the church-party, which it was not thought advisable to provoke: Nottingham and Shrewsbury were appointed secretaries of state; the privy-seal was bestowed on the marquis of Halifax; the earl of Danby was created president of the council: these two noblemen enjoyed a good share of the king's confidence, and Nottingham was considerable as head of the church-party: but the chief favorite was Bentinck, first commoner on the list of privy-counsellors, as well as groom of the stole and privy purse. D'Auverquerque was made master of the horse, Zuytlestein of the robes, and Schomberg of the ordinance: the treasury, admiralty, and chancery were put in commission; twelve able judges were chosen;<sup>3</sup> and the diocese of Salisbury being vacated by the death of Dr. Ward, the king, of his own free motion, filled it with Burnet, who had been a zealous stickler for his interest, and in a particular manner instrumental in effecting the revolution. Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, refused to consecrate this ecclesiastic, though the reasons of his refusal are not specified; but, being afraid of incurring the penalties of a premunire, he granted a commission to the bishop of London, and three other suffragans, to perform that ceremony. Burnet was a prelate of some parts and great industry; moderate in his notions of church-discipline, inquisitive, meddling, vain, and credulous: in consequence of having incurred the displeasure of the late king, he had retired to the continent, and fixed his residence in Holland, where he was naturalised, and attached himself to the interest of the prince of Orange, who consulted him about the affairs of England: he assisted in drawing up the prince's manifesto, and wrote some other papers and pamphlets in defence of his design: he was demanded of the States by the English ambassador, as a British fugitive, outlawed by king James, and excepted in the act of indemnity; nevertheless, he came over with William in quality of his chaplain, and by his intrigues contributed in some measure to the success of that expedition. The principal individuals that composed this ministry have been characterised in the history of the preceding reigns: we have had occasion to mention the fine talents, the vivacity, the flexibility of Halifax; the plausibility, the enterprising genius, the obstinacy of Danby; the pompous eloquence, the warmth, and ostentation of Nottingham; the probity and popularity of Shrewsbury. Godolphin, now brought into the treasury, was modest, silent, sagacious, and upright: Mordaunt, appointed first commissioner of that board, and afterwards created earl of Monmouth, was open, generous, and a republican in his principles: Delamere, chancellor of the exchequer, promoted in the sequel to the rank of earl of Warrington, was close and mercenary. Obsequiousness, fidelity, and attachment to his master composed the character of Bentinck, whom the king raised to the dignity of earl of Portland: the English favorite, Sidney, was a man of wit and pleasure, possessed of the most engaging talents for conversation and private friendship, but rendered unfit for public business by indolence and inattention: he was ennobled, and afterwards created earl of Romney; a title which he enjoyed with several successive posts of profit and importance. The stream of honor and preferment ran strong in favor of the whigs; and this appearance of partiality confirmed the suspicion and resentment of the opposite party.

3. The first resolution taken in the new council was to convert the convention into a parliament, that the new settlement might be strengthened by a legal sanction, which was now supposed to be wanting, as the assembly had not been convoked by the king's writ of summons: the experiment of a new election was deemed too hazardous;

therefore, the council determined that the king should, by virtue of his own authority, change the convention into a parliament, by going to the house of peers with the usual state of a sovereign, and pronouncing a speech from the throne to both houses. This expedient was accordingly practised.<sup>4</sup> He assured them he should never take any step

<sup>4</sup> This expedient was attended with an insurmountable absurdity: if the majority of the convention could not grant a legal sanction to the establishment they had made, they could never invest the prince of Orange with a just right to ascend the throne; for they could not give what they had no right to bestow; and if he ascended the throne without a just title, he could have no right to sanctify that assembly to which he owed his elevation. When the people are obliged, by tyranny, or other accidents, to have recourse to the first principles of society, namely, their own preservation, in electing a new sovereign, it will deserve consideration, whether that choice is to be effected by the majority of a parliament which has been dissolved, indeed by any parliament whatsoever, or by the body of the nation; assembled in communities, corporations, by tribes, or centuries, to signify their assent or dissent with respect to the person proposed as their sovereign. This kind of election might be attended with great inconvenience and difficulty; but these cannot possibly be avoided when the constitution is dissolved by setting aside the lineal succession to the throne. The constitution of England is founded on a parliament consisting of king, lords, and commons; but when there is no longer a king, the parliament is defective, and the constitution impaired; the members of the lower house are the representatives of the people, expressly chosen to maintain the constitution in church and state, and sworn to support the rights of the crown, as well as the liberties of the nation; but though they are elected to maintain, they have no power to alter the constitution: when the king forfeits the allegiance of his subjects, and it becomes necessary to dethrone him, the power of so doing cannot possibly reside in the representatives who are chosen, under certain limitations, for the purposes of a legislature which no longer exists; their power is of course at an end, and they are reduced to a level with other individuals that constitute the community: the right of altering the constitution, therefore, or of deviating from the established practice of inheritance in regard to the succession of the crown, is inherent in the body of the people, and every individual has an equal right to his share in the general determination, whether his opinion be signified viva voce, or by a representative whom he appoints and instructs for that purpose. It may be suggested, that the prince of Orange was raised to the throne without any convulsion, or any such difficulties and inconveniences as we have affirmed to be the necessary consequences of a measure of that nature: to this remark we answer, that since the revolution, these kingdoms have been divided and harassed by violent and implacable factions, that would diminish the good opinion they had conceived of his integrity: he told them that Holland was in such a situation as required their immediate attention and assistance; that the posture of affairs at home likewise demanded their serious consideration; that a good settlement was necessary, not only for the establishment of domestic peace, but also for the support of the protestant interest abroad: that the affairs of Ireland were too critically situated to admit of the least delay in their deliberations; he, therefore, begged they would be speedy and effectual in concerting such measures as should be judged indispensably necessary for the welfare of the nation. The commons, returning to their house, immediately passed a vote of thanks to his majesty, and made an order that his speech should be taken into consideration. After the throne had been declared vacant by a small majority of the peers, those who opposed that measure had gradually withdrawn themselves from the house; so that very few remained but such as were devoted to the new monarch: these, therefore, brought in a bill for preventing all disputes concerning the present parliament. In the mean time, Mr. Hambden, in the lower that eagerly seek the destruction of each other: that they have been exposed to plots, conspiracies, insurrections, civil wars, and successive rebellions, which have not been defeated and quelled without vast effusion of blood, infinite mischief, calamity, and expense to the nation: that they are still subjected to all those alarms and dangers which are engendered by a disputed title to the throne, and the efforts of an artful pretender; that they are necessarily wedded to the affairs of the continent, and their interest sacrificed to foreign connexions, from which they can never be disengaged. Perhaps all these calamities might have been prevented by the interposition of the prince of Orange: king James, without forfeiting the crown, might have been laid under such restrictions, that it would not have been in his power to tyrannise over his subjects either in spirituals or temporals: the power of the militia might have been vested in the two houses of parliament, as well as the nomination of persons to fill the great offices of the church and state, and superintend the economy of the administration, in the application of the public money: a law might have passed for annual parliaments, and the king might have been deprived of his power to convoke, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve them at his pleasure. Had these measures been taken, the king must have been absolutely disabled from employing other force or corruption in the prosecution of arbitrary designs; and the people must have been fairly represented in a rotation of parliaments, whose power and influence would have been but of one year's duration.

house, put the question, whether a king elected by the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons assembled at Westminster, coming to and consulting with the said lords and commons, did not make as complete a parliament, and legislative power and authority, as if the said king should cause new elections to be made by writ? Many members affirmed that the king's writ was as necessary as his presence to the being of a legal parliament; and, as the convention was defective in this particular, it could not be vested with a parliamentary authority by any management whatsoever. The whigs replied, that the essence of a parliament consisted in the meeting and co-operation of the king, lords, and commons; and that it was not material whether they were convoked by writ or by letter: they proved this assertion by examples deduced from the history of England: they observed, that a new election would be attended with great trouble, expense, and loss of time; and that such delay might prove fatal to the protestant interest in Ireland, as well as to the allies on the continent. In the midst of this debate, the bill was brought down from the lords; and being read, a committee was appointed to make some amendments: these were no sooner made, than the commons sent it back to the upper house, and it immediately received the royal assent. By this act, the lords and commons assembled at Westminster, were declared the two houses of parliament to all intents and purposes: it likewise ordained, that the present act, and all other acts to which the royal assent should be given before the next prorogation, should be understood and adjudged in law to begin on February 13: that the members, instead of the old oaths of allegiance and supremacy, should take the new oath incorporated in this act, under the ancient penalty; and, that the present parliament should be dissolved in the usual manner. Immediately after this transaction, a warm debate arose in the house of commons about the revenue, which the courtiers alleged had devolved with the crown on William, at least during the life of James; for which term the greater part of it had been granted: the members in the opposition affirmed that these grants were vacated with the throne: and at length it was voted that the revenue had expired. Then a motion was made, that a revenue should be settled on the king and queen; and the house resolved it should be taken into consideration. While they deliberated on this affair, they received a message from his majesty, importing that the late king had set sail from Brest with an armament to invade Ireland: they forthwith resolved to assist his majesty with their lives and fortunes: they voted a temporary aid of £420,000, to be levied by monthly assessments; and both houses waited on the king to signify this resolution: but this unanimity did not take place till several lords spiritual as well as temporal had, rather than taken the oaths, absented themselves from parliament: the nonjuring prelates were Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury; Turner, bishop of Ely; Lake, of Chichester; Ken, of Bath and Wells; White, of Peterborough; Lloyd, of Norwich; Thomas, of Worcester; and Frampton, of Gloucester: the temporal peers who refused the oath, were the duke of Newcastle; the earls of Clarendon, Lichfield, Exeter, Yarmouth, and Stafford; the lords Griffin and Stawell: five of the bishops withdrew themselves from the house at one time; but, before they retired, one of the number moved for a bill of toleration, and another of comprehension, by which moderate dissenters might be reconciled to the church, and admitted into ecclesiastical benefices: such bills were actually prepared and presented by the earl of Nottingham, who received the thanks of the house for the pains he had taken. From this period, the party averse to the government of William were distinguished by the appellation of Nonjurors: they rejected the notion of a king de facto, as well as all other distinctions and limitations; and declared for the absolute power, and divine, hereditary, indefeisible right of sovereigns.

4. This faction had already begun to practise against the new government: the king having received some intimation of their designs from intercepted letters, ordered the earl of Arran, Sir Robert Hamilton, and some other gentlemen of the Scottish nation to be apprehended and sent prisoners to the Tower: then he informed the two houses of the step he had taken, and even craved their advice with regard to his conduct in such a delicate affair, which had compelled him to trespass on the law of England: the lords thanked him for the care he took of their liberties, and desired he would secure all disturbers of the peace; but the commons empowered him by a bill to dispense with the habeas corpus act till April 17 next ensuing: this was a stretch of confidence in the crown which had not been made in favor of the late king, even while Argyle and Monmouth were in open rebellion. A spirit of discontent had by this time diffused itself through the army, and become so formidable to the court, that the king resolved to detain the Dutch troops in England, and send over to Holland in their room such regiments as were most tinctured with disaffection: of these the Scottish regiment of Dumbarton, commanded by mareschal Schomberg, mutinied on its march to Ipswich, seized the military chest, disarmed the officers who opposed their design, declared for king James, and with four pieces of cannon began their march for Scotland. William, being informed of this revolt, ordered general Ginckel to pursue them with three regiments of Dutch dragoons, and the mutineers surrendered at discretion. As the delinquents were natives of Scotland, which had not yet submitted in form to the new government, the king did not think proper to punish them as rebels, but ordered them to proceed for Holland according to his first intention: though this attempt proved abortive, it made a strong impression on the ministry, who were divided among themselves, and wavered in their principles: however, they seized this opportunity to bring in a bill for punishing mutiny and desertion, which in a little time passed both houses, and received the royal assent.

5. The coronation oath being altered and explained,<sup>5</sup> that ceremony was performed April 11, the bishop of London officiating, at the king's desire, in the room of the metropolitan, who was a malcontent; and next day the commons, in a body, waited on the king and queen at Whitehall with an address of congratulation. William, with a view to conciliate the affection of his new subjects, and check the progress of clamor and discontent, signified in a solemn message to the house of commons his readiness to acquiesce in any measure they should think proper to take for a new regulation or total suppression of the hearth-money, which he understood was a grievous imposition on the subjects; and this tax was afterwards abolished. He was gratified with an address of thanks, couched in the warmest expressions of duty, gratitude, and affection; declaring they would take such measures in support of his crown, as would convince the world that he reigned in the hearts of his people.

<sup>5</sup> The new form of the coronation-oath consisted in the following questions and answers:—'Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this kingdom of England, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in parliament agreed on, and the laws and customs of the same?'—'I solemnly promise so to do.'—'Will you, to your power, cause law and justice in mercy to be executed in all your judgments?'—'I will.'—'Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the gospel, and the protestant reformed religion as by law established; and will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges, as by law do or shall appertain unto them or any of them?'—'And this I promise to do.' Then the king or queen, laying his or her hand on the gospels, shall say, 'The things which I have here before promised, I will perform and keep; so help me God.'

6. He had, in his answer to their former address, assured them of his constant regard to the rights and prosperity of the nation: he had explained the exhausted state of the Dutch; expatiated on the zeal of that republic for the interests of Britain, as well as the maintenance of the protestant religion; and expressed his hope that the English parliament would not only repay the sums they had expended in his expedition, but likewise farther support them to the utmost of their ability against the common enemies of their liberties and religion: he had observed that a considerable army and fleet would be necessary for the reduction of Ireland and the protection of Britain; and he desired they would settle the revenue in such a manner, that it might be collected without difficulty and dispute. The sum total of the money expended by the States-General in William's expedition amounted to 7,000,000 of guilders, and the commons granted £600,000 for the discharge of this debt, incurred for the preservation of their rights and religion: they voted funds for raising and maintaining an army of 22,000 men, as well as for equipping a numerous fleet; but, they provided for no more than half a year's subsistence of the troops, hoping the reduction of Ireland might be finished in that term; and this instance of frugality the king considered as a mark of their diffidence of his administration. The whigs were resolved to supply him gradually, that he might be the more dependent on their zeal and attachment; but he was not at all pleased with their precaution.

7. William was naturally biased to Calvinism, and averse to persecution: whatever promises he had made, and whatever sentiments of respect he had entertained for the church of England, he seemed now in a great measure alienated from it, by the opposition he had met with from its members, particularly from the bishops, who had thwarted his measures: by absenting themselves from parliament, and refusing the oath, they had plainly disowned his title and renounced his government: he therefore resolved to mortify the church, and gratify his own friends at the same time, by removing the obstacles affixed to non-conformity, that all protestant dissenters should be rendered capable of enjoying and exercising civil employments. When he gave his assent to the bill for suspending the habeas corpus act, he recommended the establishment of a new oath in lieu of those of allegiance and supremacy: he expressed his hope that they would leave room for the admission of all his protestant subjects who should be found qualified for the service; he said, such a conjunction would unite them the more firmly among themselves, and strengthen them against their common adversaries. In consequence of this hint, a clause was inserted in the bill for abrogating the old and appointing the new oaths, by which the sacramental test was declared unnecessary in rendering any person capable of enjoying any office or employment: it was, however, rejected by a great majority in the house of lords. Another clause for the same purpose, though in different terms, was proposed by the king's direction, and met with the same fate; though in both cases several noblemen entered a protest against the resolution of the house. These fruitless efforts in favor of dissenters augmented the prejudice of the churchmen against king William, who would have willingly compromised the difference, by excusing the clergy from the oaths, provided the dissenters might be exempted from the sacramental test: but this was deemed the chief bulwark of the church, and therefore the proposal was rejected. The church-party in the house of lords moved, that instead of inserting a clause, obliging the clergy to take the oaths, the king should be empowered to tender them; and, in case of their refusal, they should incur the penalty; because deprivation, or the apprehensions of it, might make them desperate, and excite them to form designs against the government. This argument had no weight with the commons, who thought it was indispensably necessary to exact the oaths of the clergy, as their example influenced the kingdom in general, and the youth of the nation were formed under their instructions. After a long and warm debate, all the mitigation that could be obtained, was a clause empowering the king to indulge any twelve clergymen, deprived by virtue of this act, with a third part of their benefices during pleasure. Thus the ancient oaths of allegiance and supremacy were abrogated; the declaration of non-resistance in the act of uniformity was repealed; the new oath of allegiance was reduced to its primitive simplicity; and the coronation-oath rendered more explicit: the clergy were enjoined to take the new oaths before August 1, on pain of being suspended from their office for six months, and of intire deprivation, in case they should not take them before the expiration of this term. They generally complied, though with such reservations and distinctions as were not much for the honor of their sincerity.

8. The king, though baffled in his design against the sacramental test, resolved to indulge the dissenters with a toleration; and a bill for this purpose being prepared by the earl of Nottingham, was, after some debate passed into a law, under the title of 'an act for exempting their majesties' protestant subjects dissenting from the church of England from the penalties of certain laws.' It enacted, that none of the penal laws should be construed to extend to those dissenters who should take the oaths to the present government, and subscribe the declaration of the thirtieth year of the reign of Charles II. provided that they should hold no private assemblies or conventicles with the doors shut; that nothing should be construed to exempt them from the payment of tithes, or other parochial duties; that, in case of being chosen into the offices of constable, church-warden, overseer, &c. and of scrupling to take the oaths annexed to such offices, they should be allowed to execute the employment by deputy; that the preachers and teachers in congregations of dissenting protestants, who should take the oaths, subscribe the declaration, together with all the articles of religion, except the thirty-fourth and the two succeeding articles, and part of the twentieth, should be exempted from the penalties decreed against non-conformists, as well as from serving on juries, or acting in parish-offices; yet all justices of the peace were empowered to require such dissenters to subscribe the declaration, and take the oaths; and in case of refusal, to commit them to prison, without bail or mainprize. The same indulgence was extended to anabaptists, and even to quakers, on their solemn promise, before God, to be faithful to the king and queen, and their assenting by profession and asseveration to those articles which the others ratified on oath: they were likewise required to profess their belief in the Trinity and the Holy Scriptures. Even the papists felt the benign influence of William's moderation in spiritual matters: he rejected the proposals of some zealots, who exhorted him to enact severe laws against popish recusants: such a measure, he observed, would alienate all the papists of Europe from the interests of England, and might produce a new catholic league, which would render the war a religious quarrel; besides, he could not pretend to screen the protestants of Germany and Hungary, while he himself should persecute the catholics of England: he therefore resolved to treat them with lenity: and though they were not comprehended in the act, they enjoyed the benefit of the toleration.

9. We have observed, that, in consequence of the motion made by the bishops when they withdrew from parliament, a bill was brought into the house of lords for uniting their majesties' protestant subjects: this was extremely agreeable to the king, who had the scheme of comprehension very much at heart. In the progress of the bill, a warm debate arose about the posture of kneeling at the sacrament, which was given up in favor of the dissenters: another, no less violent, ensued on the subsequent question;—'whether there should be an addition of laity in the commission to be given by the king to the bishops and others of the clergy, for preparing such a reformation of ecclesiastical affairs, as might be the means of healing divisions, and correcting whatever might be erroneous or defective in the constitution.' A great number of the temporal lords insisted warmly on this addition; and when it was rejected, four peers entered a formal protest. Bishop Burnet was a warm stickler for the exclusion of the laity; and, in all probability, manifested this warmth in hopes of ingratiating himself with his brethren, among whom his character was very far from being popular: but the merit of this sacrifice was destroyed by the arguments he had used for dispensing with the posture of kneeling at the sacrament; and by his proposing, in another proviso of the bill, that the subscribers, instead of expressing assent and consent, should only submit with a promise of conformity.

10. The bill was with difficulty passed in the house of lords, but the commons treated it with neglect: by this time, a great number of malcontent members, who had retired from parliament, were returned, with a view to thwart the administration, though they could not prevent the settlement. Instead of proceeding with the bill they presented an address to the king, thanking him for his gracious declaration and repeated assurances that he would maintain the church of England as by law established; a church, whose doctrine and practice had evinced its loyalty beyond all contradiction: they likewise humbly besought his majesty to issue writs for calling a convocation of the clergy, to be consulted in ecclesiastical matters, according to the ancient usage of parliaments; and they declared they would forthwith take into consideration proper methods for giving ease to protestant dissenters. Though the king was displeased at this address, in which the lords also had concurred, he returned a civil answer, by the mouth of the earl of Nottingham, professing his regard for the church of England, which should always be his peculiar care, recommending the dissenters to their protection, and promising to summon a convocation as soon as such a measure should be convenient. This message produced no effect in favor of the bill, which lay neglected on the table: those who moved for it had no other view than that of displaying their moderation; and now they excited their friends to oppose it with all their interest: others were afraid of espousing it, lest they should be stigmatised as enemies to the church; and a great number of the most eminent presbyterians were averse to a scheme of comprehension, which diminished their strength, and weakened the importance of the party: being, therefore, violently opposed on one hand, and but faintly supported on the other, no wonder it miscarried: the king, however, was so bent on the execution of his design, that it was next session revived in another form, though with no better success.

11. The next object that engrossed the attention of the parliament was the settlement of a revenue for the support of the government: hitherto there had been no distinction of what was allotted for the king's use, and what was assigned for the service of the public; so that the sovereign was intirely master of the whole supply. As the revenue in the late reigns had been often embezzled and misapplied, it was now resolved that a certain sum should be set apart for the maintenance of the king's household, and the support of his dignity; and that the rest of the public money should be employed under the inspection of parliament: accordingly, since this period, the commons have appropriated the yearly supplies to certain specified services; and an account of the application has been constantly submitted to both houses at the next session. At this juncture, the prevailing party, or the whigs, determined that the revenue should be granted from year to year, or at least for a small term of years; that the king might find himself dependent on the parliament, and merit a renewal of the grant by a just and popular administration. In pursuance of this maxim, when the revenue fell under consideration, they, on pretence of charges and anticipations which they had not time to examine, granted it by a provisional act for one year only : the civil list was settled at £600,000, chargeable with the appointments of the queen-dowager, the prince and princess of Denmark, the judges, and mareschal Schomberg, to whom the parliament had already granted £100,000, in consideration of his important services to the nation : the commons also voted, that a constant revenue of £1,200,000 should be established for the support of the crown in time of peace.

12. The king took umbrage at these restraints laid on the application of the public money, which were the most salutary fruits of the revolution : he considered them as marks of diffidence, by which he was distinguished from his predecessors ; and thought them an ungrateful return for the services he had done the nation : the tories perceived his disgust, and did not fail to foment his jealousy against their adversaries, which was confirmed by a fresh effort of the whigs in relation to a militia : a bill was brought into the house, for regulating it in such a manner as would have rendered it in a great measure independent both of the king and the lords-lieutenants of counties ; these being generally peers. The bill was suffered to lie neglected on the table ; but the attempt confirmed the suspicion of the king, who began to think himself in danger of being enslaved by a republican party : the tories had, by the channel of Nottingham, made proffers of service to his majesty ; but complained, at the same time, that as they were in danger of being prosecuted for their lives and fortunes, they could not, without an act of indemnity, exert themselves in favor of the crown, lest they should incur a persecution from their implacable enemies.

13. These remonstrances made such impression on the king, that he sent a message to the house by Mr. Hambden, recommending a bill of indemnity as the most effectual means for putting an end to all controversies, distinctions, and occasions of discord : he desired it might be prepared with all convenient expedition, and with such exceptions only as should seem necessary for the vindication of public justice, the safety of him and his consort, and the settlement and welfare of the nation. An address of thanks to his majesty was unanimously voted : nevertheless, his design was frustrated by the backwardness of the whigs, who proceeded so slowly in the bill, that it could not be brought to maturity before the end of the session : they wanted to keep the scourge over the heads of their enemies, until they should find a proper opportunity for revenge ; and, in the mean time, restrain them from opposition by the terror of impending vengeance : they affected to insinuate that the king's design was to raise the prerogative as high as it had been in the preceding reigns ; and that he for this purpose pressed an act of indemnity, by virtue of which he might legally use the instruments of the late tyranny : the earls of Monmouth and Warrington industriously infused these jealousies into the minds of their party ; on the other hand, the earl of Nottingham inflamed William's distrust of his old friends ; both sides succeeded in kindling an animosity, which had like to have produced confusion, notwithstanding the endeavors used by the earls of Shrewsbury and Devonshire to allay those heats, and remove the suspicions that mutually prevailed.

14. It was now judged expedient to pass an act for settling the succession of the crown, according to the former resolution of the convention : a bill for this purpose was brought into the lower house, with a clause disabling papists from succeeding to the throne : to this the lords added, 'or such as should marry papists,' absolving the subject in that case from allegiance. The bishop of Salisbury, by the king's direction, proposed that the princess Sophia, duchess of Hanover, and her posterity, should be nominated in the act of succession, as the next protestant heirs, failing issue of the king and Anne princess of Denmark : these amendments gave rise to warm debates in the lower house, where they were vigorously opposed, not only by those who wished well in secret to the late king and the lineal succession ; but likewise by the republican party, who hoped to see monarchy extinguished in England, by the death of the three persons already named in the bill of succession : the lords insisted on their amendments, and several fruitless conferences were held between the two houses : at length, the bill was dropped for the present, in consequence of an event which in a great measure dissipated the fears of a popish successor : this was the delivery of the princess Anne, who, on July 27, brought forth a son, christened by the name of William, and afterwards created duke of Gloucester.

15. In the midst of these domestic disputes, William did not neglect the affairs of the continent: he retained all his former influence in Holland, as his countrymen had reason to confide in his repeated assurances of inviolable affection. The great scheme which he had projected of a confederacy against France began at this period to take effect: the princes of the empire, assembled in the diet, solemnly exhorted the emperor to declare war against the French king, who had committed numberless infractions of the treaties of Munster, Osnaburg, Nimeguen and the truce; invaded their country without provocation, and evinced himself an inveterate enemy of the holy Roman empire: they therefore besought his imperial majesty to conclude a treaty of peace with the Turks, who had offered advantageous terms, and proceed to an open rupture with Louis; in which case they would consider it as a war of the empire, and support their head in the most effectual manner. The States-General published a declaration against the common enemy; taxing him with manifold infractions of the treaty of commerce; with having involved the subjects of the republic in the persecution which he had raised against the protestants; with having cajoled and insulted them with deceitful promises and insolent threats; with having plundered and oppressed the Dutch merchants and traders in France; and, finally, with having declared war against the States, without any plausible reason assigned. The elector of Brandenburg denounced war against France, as a power whose perfidy, cruelty, and ambition it was the duty of every prince to oppose. The marquis de Castanaga, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, issued a counter-declaration to that of Louis, who had declared war against his master: he accused the French king of having laid waste the empire, without any regard to the obligations of religion and humanity, or even to the laws of war; of having countenanced the most barbarous acts of cruelty and oppression; and of having intrigued with the enemies of Christ for the destruction of the empire. The emperor negotiated an alliance offensive and defensive with the States-General, binding the contracting parties to co-operate with their whole power against France and her allies: it was stipulated, that neither side should engage in a separate treaty, on any pretence whatsoever; that no peace should be admitted, until the treaties of Westphalia, Osnaburg, Munster, and the Pyrenees should have been vindicated; that, in case of a negotiation for a peace or truce, the transactions on both sides should be communicated bona fide; and that Spain and England should be invited to accede to the treaty. In a separate article, the contracting powers agreed, that in case of the Spanish king's dying without issue, the States-General should assist the emperor with all their forces to take possession of that monarchy; that they should use their friendly endeavors with the princes electors, their allies, towards elevating his son Joseph to the dignity of king of the Romans; and employ their utmost force against France, should she attempt to oppose his elevation.

16. William, who was the soul of this confederacy, found no difficulty in persuading the English to undertake a war against their old enemies and rivals. On April 16, Mr. Hambden made a motion for taking into consideration the state of the kingdom with respect to France and foreign alliances; and the commons unanimously resolved, that in case his majesty should think fit to engage in war with France, they would, in a parliamentary way, enable him to carry it on with vigor: an address was immediately drawn up, and presented to the king, desiring he would seriously consider the destructive methods taken of late years by the French king against the trade, quiet, and interest of the nation; particularly his present invasion of Ireland, and supporting the rebels in that kingdom. They did not doubt but the alliances already made, and those that might hereafter be concluded by his majesty, would be sufficient to reduce the French king to such a condition, that it should not be in his power to violate the peace of Christendom, nor prejudice the trade and prosperity of England; in the mean time they assured his majesty he might depend on the assistance of his parliament, according to the vote which had passed in the house of commons. This was a welcome address to king William: he assured them that no part of the supplies which they might grant for the prosecution of the war should be misapplied; and, on May 7, he declared war against the French monarch. On this occasion, Louis was charged with having ambitiously invaded the territories of the emperor, and denounced war against the allies of England, in violation of the treaties confirmed under the guarantee of the English crown; with having encroached on the fishery of Newfoundland, invaded the Caribbee islands, taken forcible possession of New York and Hudson's-bay, made depredations on the English at sea, prohibited the importation of English manufactures, disputed the right of the flag, persecuted many English subjects on account of religion contrary to express treaties and the law of nations, and sent an armament to Ireland in support of the rebels of that kingdom.

17. Having thus described the progress of the revolution in England, we shall now briefly explain the measures that were prosecuted in Scotland towards the establishment of William on the throne of that kingdom. The meeting of the Scottish convention was fixed for March 14; and both parties employed all their interest to influence the election of members. The duke of Hamilton and all the presbyterians declared for William: the duke of Gordon maintained the castle of Edinburgh for his old master; but, as he had neglected to lay in a store of provisions, he depended intirely on the citizens for subsistence. The partisans of James were headed by the earl of Balcarras, and Graham viscount Dundee, who employed their endeavors to preserve union among the individuals of their party; to confirm the duke of Gordon, who began to waver in his attachment to their sovereign; and to manage their intrigues in such a manner as to derive some advantage to their cause from the transactions of the ensuing session. When the lords and commons assembled at Edinburgh, the bishop of that diocese, who officiated as chaplain to the convention, prayed for the restoration of king James. The first dispute turned on the choice of a president: the friends of the late king set up the marquis of Athol in opposition to the duke of Hamilton; but this last was elected by a considerable majority; and a good number of the other party, finding their cause the weakest, deserted it from that moment: the earls of Lothian and Tweeddale were sent as deputies, to require the duke of Gordon, in the name of the estates, to quit the castle in four-and-twenty hours, and leave the charge of it to the protestant officer next in command. The duke, though in himself irresolute, was animated by Dundee to demand such conditions as the convention would not grant: the negotiation proving ineffectual, the states ordered the heralds, in all their formalities, to summon him to surrender the castle immediately, on pain of incurring the penalties of high treason; and he refusing to obey their mandate, was proclaimed a traitor: all persons were forbidden, under the same penalties, to aid, succor, or correspond with him; and the castle was blocked up with the troops of the city.

18. Next day an express arrived from London, with a letter from king William to the estates ; and, at the same time, another from James was presented by one Crane, an English domestic of the abdicated queen. William observed, that he had called a meeting of their estates at the desire of the nobility and gentry of Scotland assembled at London, who requested that he would take on himself the administration of their affairs : he exhorted them to concert measures for settling the peace of the kingdom on a solid foundation ; and to lay aside animosities and factions, which served only to impede that salutary settlement : he professed himself sensible of the good effects that would arise from a union of the two kingdoms ; and assured them he would use his best endeavors to promote such a coalition. A committee being appointed to draw up a respectful answer to these assurances, a debate ensued about the letter from the late king James : this they resolved to favor with a reading, after the members should have subscribed an act, declaring, that notwithstanding any thing that might be contained in the letter for dissolving the convention or impeding their procedure, they were a free and lawful meeting of the states ; and would continue undissolved, until they should have settled and secured the protestant religion, the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom. Having taken this precaution, they proceeded to examine the letter of the late sovereign, who conjured them to support his interest as faithful subjects, and eternise their names by a loyalty suitable to their former professions : he said he would not fail to give them such speedy and powerful assistance as would enable them to defend themselves from any foreign attempt ; and even to assert his right against those enemies, who had depressed it by the blackest usurpations and unnatural attempts, which the Almighty God would not allow to pass unpunished : he offered pardon to all those who should return to their duty before the last day of the month, and threatened to punish rigorously such as should stand out in rebellion against him and his authority.

19. This address produced very little effect in favor of the unfortunate exile, whose friends were greatly outnumbered in this assembly : his messenger was ordered into custody, and afterwards dismissed with a pass instead of an answer. James, foreseeing this contempt, had, by an instrument dated in Ireland, authorised the archbishop of Glasgow, the earl of Balcarras, and the viscount Dundee, to call a convention of the estates at Stirling: these three depended on the interest of the marquis of Athol and the earl of Mar, who professed the warmest affection for the late king; and they hoped a secession of their friends would embarrass the convention, so as to retard the settlement of king William: their expectations, however, were disappointed: Athol deserted their cause, and Mar suffered himself to be intercepted in his retreat: the rest of their party were, by the vigilance of the duke of Hamilton, prevented from leaving the convention, except the viscount Dundee, who retreated to the mountains with about fifty horse, and was pursued by order of the estates. This design being frustrated, the convention approved and recognised, by a solemn act, the conduct of the nobility and gentlemen who had entreated the king of England to take on him the administration; they acknowledged their obligation to the prince of Orange, who had prevented the destruction of their laws, religion, and fundamental constitution; they besought his highness to assume the reins of government for that kingdom; they issued a proclamation, requiring all persons from sixteen to sixty to be in readiness to take arms when called on for that purpose; they conferred the command of their horse-militia on Sir Patrick Hume, who was formerly attainted for having been concerned in Argyle's insurrection; they levied 800 men for a guard to the city of Edinburgh, and constituted the earl of Leven their commander; they put the militia all over the kingdom into the hands of those on whom they could rely; they created the earl of Mar governor of Stirling-castle; they received a reinforcement of five regiments from England, under the command of Mackay, whom they appointed their general; and they issued orders for securing all disaffected persons: then they despatched lord Ross, with an answer to king William's letter, professing their gratitude to their deliverer, and congratulating him on his success. They thanked him for assuming the administration of their affairs, and assembling a convention of their estates: they declared they would take effectual and speedy measures for securing the protestant religion, as well as for establishing the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom: they assured him they would, as much as lay in their power, avoid disputes and animosities; and desired the continuance of his majesty's care and protection.

20. After the departure of lord Ross, they appointed a committee, consisting of eight lords, eight knights, and as many burgesses, to prepare the plan of a new settlement: but this resolution was not taken without a vigorous opposition from some remaining adherents of the late king, headed by the archbishop of Glasgow; all the other prelates, except he of Edinburgh, having already deserted the convention. After warm debates, the committee agreed in the following vote:—‘the estates of the kingdom of Scotland find and declare, that king James VII. being a professed papist, did assume the royal power, and act as a king, without ever taking the oath required by law; and had, by the advice of evil and wicked counsellors, invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal and limited monarchy to an arbitrary despotic power; and had governed the same to the subversion of the protestant religion, and violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government; whereby he had forfeited the right of the crown, and the throne was become vacant.’ When this vote was reported, the bishop of Edinburgh argued strenuously against it, as containing a charge of which the king was innocent; and he proposed that his majesty should be invited to return to his Scottish dominions. All his arguments were defeated or over-ruled, and the house confirmed the vote, which was immediately enacted into a law by a great majority: the lord president declared the throne vacant, and proposed that it might be filled with William and Mary, king and queen of England: the committee was ordered to prepare an act for settling the crown on their majesties, together with an instrument of government for securing the subjects from the grievances under which they labored.

21. On the eleventh day of April, this act, with the conditions of inheritance and the instrument, were reported, considered, unanimously approved, and solemnly proclaimed at the market-cross of Edinburgh, in presence of the lord president, assisted by the lord provost and magistracy of the city, the duke of Queensbury, the marquises of Athol and Douglas, together with a great number of the nobility and gentry: at the same time they published another proclamation, forbidding all persons to acknowledge, obey, assist, or correspond with the late king James; or, by word, writing, or sermon to dispute or disown the royal authority of king William and queen Mary; or to misconstrue the proceedings of the estates; or create jealousies or misapprehensions with regard to the transactions of the government, on pain of incurring the most severe penalties : then, having settled the coronation-oath, they granted a commission to the earl of Argyle for the lords, to Sir James Montgomery for the knights, and to Sir John Dalrymple for the boroughs, empowering them to repair to London, and invest their majesties with the government. This affair being discussed, the convention appointed a committee to take care of the public peace, and adjourned to May 21. On the eleventh day of that month, the Scottish commissioners, being introduced to their majesties at Whitehall, presented first a preparatory letter from the estates ; then the instrument of government, with a paper containing a recital of the grievances of the nation ; and an address, desiring his majesty to convert the convention into a parliament. The king having graciously promised to concur with them in all just measures for the interest of the kingdom, the coronation-oath was tendered to their majesties by the earl of Argyle. As it contained a clause, importing that they should root out heresy, the king declared, that he did not mean by these words that he should be under an obligation to act as a persecutor : the commissioners replying that such was not the meaning or import of the oath, he desired them and others present to bear witness to the exception he had made.

22. In the mean time, lord Dundee exerted himself with uncommon activity in behalf of his master : he had been summoned by a trumpet to return to the convention ; refused to obey the citation, on pretence that the whigs had made an attempt on his life ; and that the deliberations of the estates were influenced by the neighborhood of English troops, under the command of Mackay : he was forthwith declared a fugitive, outlaw, and rebel. He was rancorously hated by the presbyterians, on whom he had exercised some cruelties, as an officer under the former government ; and for this reason the states resolved to inflict on him exemplary punishment : parties were detached in pursuit of him and Balcarras : this last fell into their hands, and was committed to a common prison ; but Dundee fought his way through the troops that surrounded him, and escaped to the highlands, where he determined to take arms in favor of James, though that prince had forbidden him to make any attempt of this nature until he should receive a reinforcement from Ireland. While this officer was employed in assembling the clans of his party, king William appointed the duke of Hamilton commissioner to the convention parliament : the post of secretary for Scotland was bestowed on lord Melvil, a weak and servile nobleman, who had taken refuge in Holland from the violences of the late reigns: but the king depended chiefly for advice on Dalrymple lord Stair, president of the college of justice, an old crafty fanatic, who for fifty years had complied in all things with all governments. Though these were rigid presbyterians, the king, to humor the opposite party, admitted some individuals of the episcopal nobility to the council-board; and this intermixture, instead of allaying animosities, served only to sow the seed of discord and confusion. The Scottish convention, in their detail of grievances, enumerated the lords of the articles; the act of parliament in the reign of Charles II. by which the king's supremacy was raised so high, that he could prescribe any mode of religion according to his pleasure; and the superiority of any office in the church above that of presbyters: the king, in his instructions to the lord commissioner, consented to the regulation of the lords of the articles, though he would not allow the institution to be abrogated; he was contented that the act relating to the king's supremacy should be rescinded; and that the church government should be established in such a manner as would be most agreeable to the inclinations of the people.

23. On the seventeenth day of June, duke Hamilton opened the Scottish parliament, after the convention had assumed this name, in consequence of an act passed by his majesty's direction; but the members in general were extremely chagrined when they found the commissioners so much restricted in the affair of the lords of the articles, which they considered as their chief grievance.<sup>6</sup> The king permitted that the estates should choose the lords by their own suffrages; and that they should be at liberty to reconsider any subject which the said lords might reject: he afterwards indulged the three estates with the choice of eleven delegates each, for this committee, to be elected monthly, or oftener, if they should think fit: but even these concessions proved unsatisfactory, while the institution itself remained: their discontents were not even appeased by the passing of an act abolishing prelacy: indeed, their resentment was inflamed by another consideration; namely, that of the king's having given seats in the council to some individuals attached to the hierarchy. They manifested their sentiments on this subject by bringing in a bill, excluding from any public trust, place, or employment under their majesties, all such as had been concerned in the encroachments of the late reign, or had discovered disaffection to the late happy change, or in any way retarded or obstructed the designs of the convention. This measure was prosecuted with great warmth; and the bill passed through all the forms of the house, but proved ineffectual, for want of the royal assent.

24. Nor were they less obstinate in the affair of the judges, whom the king had ventured to appoint by virtue of his own prerogative: the malcontents brought in a bill declaring the bench vacant, as it was at the restoration; asserting their own right to examine and approve those who should be appointed to fill it; providing, that if in time to come any such total vacancy should occur, the nomination should be in the king or queen, or regent for the time being, and the parliament retain the right of approbation; and that all the clauses in the several acts relating to the admission of the ordinary lords of session, and their qualifications for that office, should be ratified and confirmed for perpetual observation. Such was the interest of this party, that the bill was carried by a great majority, notwithstanding the opposition of the ministers, who resolved to maintain the king's nomination, even in defiance of a parliamentary resolution: the majority, exasperated at this open violation of their privileges, forbade the judges whom the king had appointed, to open their commissions, or hold a session until his majesty's farther pleasure should be known: on the other hand, they were compelled to act by the menaces of the privy-council. The dispute was carried on with great acrimony on both sides; and produced such a ferment, that before the session opened, the ministry thought proper to draw a great number of forces into the neighborhood of Edinburgh, to support the judges in the exercise of their functions.

25. The lord commissioner, alarmed at this scene of tumult and confusion, adjourned the house till October 8; a step, which, added to the unpopular measures of the court, incensed the opposition to a violent degree: they drew up a remonstrance to the king, complaining of this adjournment while the nation was yet unsettled; recapitulating the several instances in which they had expressed their zeal and affection for his majesty; explaining their reasons for dissenting from the ministry in some articles; beseeching him to consider what they had represented, to give his royal assent to the acts of parliament which they had prepared, and take measures for redressing all the other grievances of the nation. This address was presented to the king at Hampton-court. William was so touched with the reproaches it implied, as if he had not fulfilled the conditions on which he accepted the crown of Scotland, that he, in his own vindication, published his instructions to the commissioner; and by these it appeared that the duke might have proceeded to greater lengths in obliging his countrymen: before the adjournment, however, the parliament had granted the revenue for life; and raised money for maintaining a body of forces, as well as for supporting the incidental expense of the government for some months; yet part of the troops in that kingdom were supplied and subsisted by the administration of England: in consequence of these disputes in the Scottish parliament, their church was left without any settled form of government; for though the hierarchy was abolished, the presbyterian discipline was not yet established, and ecclesiastical affairs were occasionally regulated by the privy-council, deriving its authority from that very act of supremacy, which, according to the claim of rights, ought to have been repealed.

26. The session was no sooner adjourned than Sir John Lanier converted the blockade of Edinburgh-castle into a regular siege, which was prosecuted with such vigor, that in a little time the fortifications were ruined, and the works advanced at the foot of the walls, in which the besiegers had made several large breaches. The duke of Gordon, finding his ammunition expended, his defences destroyed, his intelligence intirely cut off, and despairing of relief from the adherents of his master, desired to capitulate, and obtained very favorable terms for his garrison; but he would not stipulate any conditions for himself, declaring that he had so much respect for all the princes descended from king James VI. that he would not affront any of them so far as to insist on terms for his own particular: he therefore, on the thirteenth day of June, surrendered the castle and himself at discretion. All the hopes of James and his party were now concentrated in the viscount Dundee, who had assembled a body of highlanders, and resolved to attack Mackay, on an assurance he had received by message, that the regiment of Scottish dragoons would desert their officer, and join him in the action: Mackay, having received intimation of this design, decamped immediately, and by long marches retired before Dundee, until he was reinforced by Ramsey's dragoons, and another regiment of English infantry: then he faced about, and Dundee in his turn retreated into Lochabar. Lord Murray, son of the marquis of Athol, assembled his vassals to the number of 1200 men for the service of the regency; but he was betrayed by one of his own dependents, who seized the castle of Blair for Dundee, and prevailed on the Athol men to disperse, rather than fight against James, their lawful sovereign.

27. The viscount was by this time reduced to great difficulty and distress: his men had not for many weeks tasted bread or salt, or any drink but water: instead of 500 infantry, 300 horse, with a supply of arms, ammunition, and provision, which James had promised to send from Ireland, he received a reinforcement of 300 naked recruits; but the transports with the stores fell into the hands of the English. Though this was a mortifying disappointment, he bore it without repining; and, far from abandoning himself to despair, began his march to the castle of Blair, which was threatened with a siege by general Mackay: when he reached this fortress, he received intelligence that the enemy had entered the pass of Killycrankie, and he resolved to give them battle without delay: he accordingly advanced against them, and a furious engagement ensued, though it was not of long duration. The highlanders, having received and returned the fire of the English, fell in among them sword in hand with such impetuosity, that the foot were utterly broken in seven minutes: the dragoons fled at the first charge in the utmost consternation: Dundee's horse, not exceeding 100, broke through Mackay's own regiment; the earl of Dumbarton, at the head of a few volunteers, made himself master of the artillery: 1200 of Mackay's forces were killed on the spot, 500 taken prisoners, and the rest fled with great precipitation for some hours, until they were rallied by their general, who was an officer of approved courage, conduct, and experience. Nothing could be more complete or decisive than the victory which the highlanders obtained; yet it was dearly purchased with the death of their beloved chieftain, the viscount Dundee, who fell by a random shot in the engagement, and his fate produced such confusion in his army as prevented all pursuit. He possessed an enterprising spirit, undaunted courage, inviolable fidelity, and was peculiarly qualified to command the people who fought under his banner: he was the life and soul of that cause which he espoused, and after his death it daily declined into ruin and disgrace: he was succeeded in command by colonel Cannon, who landed the reinforcement from Ireland; but all his designs miscarried: so that the clans, wearied with repeated misfortunes, laid down their arms by degrees, and took the benefit of a pardon, which king William offered to those who should submit within the time specified in his proclamation.

28. After this sketch of Scottish affairs, it will be necessary to take a retrospective view of James, and relate the particulars of his expedition to Ireland. That unfortunate prince and his queen were received with the most cordial hospitality by the French monarch, who assigned the castle of St. Germain for the place of their residence, supported their household with great magnificence, enriched them with presents, and undertook to re-establish them on the throne of England: James, however, conducted himself in such a manner as conveyed no favorable idea of his spirit and understanding: he seems to have been emasculated by religion: he was deserted by that courage and magnanimity for which his youth had been distinguished: he did not discover great sensibility at the loss of his kingdom: all his faculties were swallowed up in bigotry. Instead of contriving plans for retrieving his crown, he held conferences with the Jesuits on topics of religion. The pity which his misfortunes excited in Louis was mingled with contempt: the pope supplied him with indulgences, while the Romans laughed at him in pasquinades: — ‘There is a pious man,’ said the archbishop of Rheims ironically, ‘who has sacrificed three crowns for a mass.’ In a word, he subjected himself to the ridicule and raillery of the French nation.

29. All the hope of re-ascending the British throne dependent on his friends in Scotland and Ireland : Tyrconnel, who commanded in this last kingdom, was confirmed in his attachment to James by the persuasions of Hamilton, who had undertaken for his submission to the prince of Orange : nevertheless, he disguised his sentiments, and temporised with William, until James should be able to supply him with reinforcements from France, which he earnestly solicited by private messages : in the mean time, with a view to cajole the protestants of Ireland, and amuse king William with hope of his submission, he persuaded the lord Mountjoy, in whom the protestants chiefly confided, and baron Rice, to go in person with a commission to James, representing the necessity of yielding to the times, and of waiting a fitter opportunity to make use of his Irish subjects. Mountjoy, on his arrival at Paris, instead of being favored with an audience by James, to explain the reasons which Tyrconnel had suggested touching the inability of Ireland to restore his majesty, was committed prisoner to the Bastile, on account of the zeal with which he had espoused the protestant interest. Although Louis was sincerely disposed to assist James effectually, his intentions were obstructed by the disputes of his ministry : Louvois possessed the chief credit in council ; but Seignelai enjoyed a greater share of personal favor, both with the king and Madame de Maintenon, the favorite concubine. To this nobleman, as secretary for marine affairs, James made his chief application ; and he had promised the command of the troops destined for his service to Lauzun, whom Louvois hated : for these reasons this minister thwarted his measures, and retarded the assistance which Louis had promised toward his restoration.

30. Yet, notwithstanding all his opposition, the succors were prepared, and the fleet ready to put to sea by the latter end of February : the French king is said to have offered an army of 15,000 natives of France to serve in this expedition ; but James replied, that he would succeed by the help of his own subjects, or perish in the attempt : accordingly, he contented himself with about 1200 British subjects,<sup>7</sup> and a good number of French officers, who were embarked in the fleet at Brest, consisting of fourteen ships of the line, seven frigates, three fire-ships, with a good number of transports: the French king also supplied him with a considerable quantity of arms for the use of his adherents in Ireland; accommodated him with a large sum of money, superb equipages, store of plate, and necessaries of all kinds for the camp and the household: at parting, he presented him with his own cuirass, and, embracing him affectionately, 'The best thing I can wish you,' said he, 'is that I may never see you again.' On the seventh day of March, James embarked at Brest, together with the count D'Avaux, who accompanied him in quality of ambassador, and his principal officers: he was detained in the harbor by contrary winds till the seventeenth day of the month, when he set sail, and on the twenty-second landed at Kinsale in Ireland. By this time, king William, perceiving himself amused by Tyrconnel, had published a declaration, requiring the Irish to lay down their arms, and submit to the new government. On the twenty-second day of February, thirty ships of war had been put in commission, and the command of them conferred on admiral Herbert; but the armament was retarded in such a manner by the disputes of the council, and the king's attention to the affairs of the continent, that the admiral was not in a condition to sail till the beginning of April, and then with part of his fleet only. James was received with open arms at Kinsale, and the whole country seemed to be at his devotion; for, although the protestants in the north had declared for the new government, their strength and number were deemed inconsiderable when compared with the power of Tyrconnel. This minister had disarmed all the other protestant subjects in one day, and assembled an army of 30,000 foot and 8000 cavalry for the service of his master.

Chester and Galway; the late lord chief-justice Herbert; the marquis D'Estrades, M. de Rosene, mareschal de Champ; Mamoe, Pusignan, and Lori, lieutenant-generals; Prontee, engineer-general; the marquis d'Abbeville, Sir John Sparrow, Sir Roger Strickland, Sir William Jennings, Sir Henry Bond, Sir Charles Carney, Sir Edward Vaudrey, Sir Charles Murray, Sir Robert Parker, Sir Alphonso Maiolo, Sir Samuel Foxon, and Sir William Wallis; by the colonels Porter, Sarsfield, Antony and John Hamilton, Simon and Henry Luttrell, Ramsay, Dorrington, Sutherland, Clifford, Parker, Purcel, Cannon, and Fielding, with about two-and-twenty other officers of inferior rank.

31. In the latter end of March, James made his public entry into Dublin amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants: he was met at the castle-gate by a procession of popish bishops and priests in their pontificals, bearing the host, which he publicly adored: he dismissed from the council-board the lord Granard, judge Keating, and other protestants, who had exhorted the lord-lieutenant to an accommodation with the new government: in their room he admitted the French ambassador, the bishop of Chester, colonel Dorrington, and, by degrees, the principal noblemen who accompanied him in the expedition. On the second day after his arrival in Dublin, he issued five proclamations: the first recalled all the subjects of Ireland who had abandoned the kingdom, by a certain time, on pain of outlawry and confiscation, and requiring all persons to join him against the prince of Orange: the second contained expressions of acknowledgement to his catholic subjects for their vigilance and fidelity, and an injunction to such as were not actually in his service to retain and lay up their arms until it should be found necessary to use them for his advantage: by the third he invited the subjects to supply his army with provisions; and prohibited the soldiers to take any thing without payment: by the fourth he raised the value of the current coin; and in the fifth he summoned a parliament to meet on the seventh day of May at Dublin: finally, he created Tyrconnel a duke in consideration of his eminent services.

32. The adherents of James in England pressed him to settle the affairs of Ireland immediately, and bring over his army either to the north of England, or the west of Scotland, where it might be joined by his party, and act without delay against the usurper; but his council dissuaded him from complying with their solicitations until Ireland should be totally reduced to obedience. On the first alarm of an intended massacre, the protestants of Londonderry had shut their gates against the regiment commanded by the earl of Antrim, and resolved to defend themselves against the lord-lieutenant: they transmitted this resolution to the government of England, together with an account of the danger they incurred by such a vigorous measure, and implored immediate assistance: they were accordingly supplied with some arms and ammunition, but did not receive any considerable reinforcement till the middle of April, when two regiments arrived in Loughfoyl, under the command of Cunningham and Richards : by this time king James had taken Coleraine, invested Killmore, and was almost in sight of Londonderry. George Walker, rector of Donaghmore, who had raised a regiment for the defence of the protestants, conveyed this intelligence to Lundy, the governor : this officer directed him to join colonel Crafton, and take post at the Longcausey, which he maintained a whole night against the advanced guard of the enemy ; until being overpowered by numbers, he retreated to Londonderry, and exhorted the governor to take the field, as the army of king James was not yet completely formed. Lundy assembling a council of war, at which Cunningham and Richards assisted, they agreed, that as the place was not yet tenable, it would be imprudent to land the two regiments ; and that the principal officers should withdraw themselves from Londonderry, the inhabitants of which would obtain the more favorable capitulation in consequence of their retreat : an officer was immediately despatched to king James with proposals of a negociation ; and lieutenant-general Hamilton agreed that the army should halt at the distance of four miles from the town. Notwithstanding this preliminary, James advanced at the head of his troops ; but met with such a warm reception from the besieged, that he was fain to retire to St. John's Town in some disorder. The inhabitants and soldiers in garrison at Londonderry were so incensed at the members of the council of war, who had resolved to abandon the place, that they threatened immediate vengeance : Cunningham and Richards retired to their ships, and Lundy locked himself in his chamber : in vain did Walker and major Baker exhort him to maintain his government : such was his cowardice or treachery, that he absolutely refused to be concerned in the defence of the place ; and he was suffered to escape in disguise, with a load of match on his back ; but he was afterwards apprehended in Scotland, from whence he was sent to London to answer for his perfidy or misconduct.

33. After his retreat, the townsmen chose Mr. Walker and major Baker for their governors, with joint authority ; but this office they would not undertake, until it had been offered to colonel Cunningham, as the officer next in command to Lundy : he rejected the proposal, and with Richards returned to England, where they were immediately cashiered. The two new governors, thus abandoned to their fate, began to prepare for a vigorous defence : indeed their courage seems to have transcended the bounds of discretion ; for the place was very ill fortified : their cannon, which did not exceed twenty pieces, were wretchedly mounted ; they had not one engineer to direct their operations ; they had a very small number of horse ; the garrison consisted of people unacquainted with military discipline ; they were destitute of provisions ; they were besieged by a king in person, at the head of a formidable army, directed by good officers, and supplied with all the necessary implements for a siege or battle. This town was invested on the twentieth day of April ; the batteries were soon opened, and several attacks were made with great impetuosity ; but the besiegers were always repulsed with considerable loss : the townsmen gained divers advantages in repeated sallies, and would have held their enemies in the utmost contempt, had they not been afflicted with a contagious distemper, as well as reduced to extremity, by want of provision : they were even tantalised in their distress ; for they had the mortification to see some ships, which had arrived with supplies from England, prevented from sailing up the river by the batteries the enemy had raised on both sides, and a boom with which they had blocked up the channel : at length, a reinforcement arrived in the Lough, under the command of general Kirke, who had deserted his master, and been employed in the service of king William : he found means to convey intelligence to Walker that he had troops and provisions on board for their relief, but found it impracticable to sail up the river : he promised, however, that he would land a body of forces at the Inch, and endeavor to make a diversion in their favor, when joined by the troops at Inniskilling, which amounted to 5000 men, including 2000 cavalry. He said he expected 6000 men from England, where they were embarked before he set sail : he exhorted them to persevere in their courage and loyalty, and assured them he would come to their relief at all hazards. These assurances enabled them to bear their miseries a little longer, though their numbers daily diminished. Major Baker dying, his place was filled with colonel Michelburn, who now acted as colleague to Mr. Walker.

34. King James having returned to Dublin to be present at the parliament, the command of his army devolved to the French general Rosene, who was exasperated at such an obstinate opposition by a handful of half-starved militia. He threatened to rase the town to its foundations, and destroy the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex, unless they would immediately submit themselves to their lawful sovereign: the governors treated his menaces with contempt; and published an order that no person, on pain of death, should talk of surrendering: they had now consumed the last remains of their provision, and supported life by eating the flesh of horses, dogs, cats, rats, mice, tallow, starch, and salted hides, and even this loathsome food began to fail: Rosene, finding them deaf to all his proposals, threatened to wreak his vengeance on all the protestants of that country, and drive them under the walls of Londonderry, where they should be suffered to perish by famine. The bishop of Meath, being informed of this design, complained to king James of the barbarous intention, entreating his majesty to prevent its being put in execution: that prince assured him that he had already ordered Rosene to desist from such proceedings: nevertheless, the Frenchman executed his threats with the utmost rigor. Parties of dragoons were detached on this cruel service: after having stripped all the protestants for thirty miles round, they drove these unhappy people before them like cattle, without even sparing the enfeebled old men, nurses, with infants at their breasts, tender children, women just delivered, and some even in the pangs of labor: above 4000 of these miserable objects were driven under the walls of Londonderry. This expedient, far from answering the purpose of Rosene, produced a quite contrary effect: the besieged were so exasperated at this act of inhumanity, that they resolved to perish rather than submit to such a barbarian: they erected a gibbet in sight of the enemy, and sent a message to the French general, importing, that they would hang all the prisoners they had taken during the siege unless the protestants whom they had driven under the walls should be immediately dismissed: this threat produced a negociation, in consequence of which the protestants were released, after they had been detained three days without tasting food. Some hundreds died of famine or fatigue; and those who lived to return to their own habitations found them plundered and sacked by the papists, so that the greater number perished for want or were murdered by the straggling parties of the enemy; yet these very people had for the most part obtained protections from king James, to which no respect was paid by his general.

35. The garrison of Londonderry was now reduced from 7000 to 5700 men ; and these were driven to such extremity of distress, that they began to talk of killing the popish inhabitants, and feeding on their bodies : in this emergency, Kirke, who had hitherto lain inactive, ordered two ships laden with provisions to sail up the river, under convoy of the Dartmouth frigate : one of these, called the Mountjoy, broke the enemy's boom ; and all the three, after having sustained a very hot fire from both sides of the river, arrived in safety at the town, to the inexpressible joy of the inhabitants. The army of James were so dispirited by the success of this enterprise, that they abandoned the siege in the night, and retired with precipitation, after having lost about 9000 men before the place : Kirke no sooner took possession of the town, than Walker was prevailed to embark for England, with an address of thanks from the inhabitants to their majesties for the seasonable relief they had received.

36. The Inniskilliners were no less remarkable than the people of Londonderry for the valor and perseverance with which they opposed the papists : they raised twelve companies, which they regimented under the command of Gustavus Hamilton, whom they chose for their governor : they proclaimed William and Mary on the eleventh day of March, and resolved in a general council to maintain their title against all opposition. The lord Gilmoy invested the castle of Crom belonging to the protestants in the neighborhood of Inniskillin, the inhabitants of which threw succors into the place, and compelled Gilmoy to retire to Belturbet : a detachment of the garrison, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Lloyd, took and demolished the castle of Aughor, and they gained the advantage in several skirmishes with the enemy : on the day that preceded the relief of Londonderry, they defeated 6000 Irish papists at a place called Newton-Butler, and took their commander Macarty, commonly called lord Montcashel.

37. The Irish parliament being assembled at Dublin, according to the proclamation of king James, he, in a speech from the throne, thanked them for the zeal, courage, and loyalty they had manifested ; extolled the generosity of the French king, who had enabled him to visit them in person ; insisted on executing his design of establishing liberty of conscience, as a step equally agreeable to the dictates of humanity and discretion ; and promised to concur with them in enacting such laws as would contribute to the peace, affluence, and security of his subjects. Sir Richard Neagle, being chosen speaker of the commons, moved for an address of thanks to his majesty, and that the count D'Avaux should be desired to make their acknowledgements to the most christian king, for the generous assistance he had given to their sovereign. These addresses being drawn up, with the concurrence of both houses, a bill was brought in to recognise the king's title; to express their abhorrence of the usurpation by the prince of Orange, as well as of the defection of the English. Next day James published a declaration, complaining of the calumnies which his enemies had spread to his prejudice; expatiating on his own impartiality in preferring his protestant subjects; his care in protecting them from their enemies, in redressing their grievances, and in granting liberty of conscience; promising that he would take no step but with the approbation of parliament; offering a free pardon to all persons who should desert his enemies, and join with him in four-and-twenty days after his landing in Ireland; and charging all the blood that might be shed on those who should continue in rebellion.

38. His conduct, however, very ill agreed with this declaration; nor can it be excused on any other supposition, but that of his being governed, in some cases against his own inclination, by the count D'Avaux, and the Irish catholics, on whom his whole dependence was placed: as both houses were chiefly filled with members of that persuasion, we ought not to wonder at their bringing in a bill for repealing the act of settlement, by which the protestants of the kingdom had been secured in the possession of their estates: these were by this law divested of their lands, which reverted to the heirs of those catholics to whom they belonged before their rebellion. This iniquitous bill was framed in such a manner, that no regard was paid to such protestant owners as had purchased estates for valuable considerations; no allowance was made for improvements, nor any provision for protestant widows; the possessor and tenants were not even allowed to remove their stock and corn. When the bill was sent up to the lords, Dr. Dopping, bishop of Meath, opposed it with equal courage and ability; and an address in behalf of the purchasers under the act of settlement was presented to the king by the earl of Granard; but, notwithstanding these remonstrances, it received the royal assent; and the protestants of Ireland were mostly ruined.

39. Yet, in order to complete their destruction, an act of attainder was passed against all protestants, whether male or female, whether of high or low degree, who were absent from the kingdom; as well as against all those who retired into any part of the three kingdoms, who did not own the authority of king James, or corresponded with rebels, or were any ways aiding, abetting, or assisting to them from the first day of August in the preceding year: the number of protestants attainted by name in this act amounted to about 3000, including two archbishops, one duke, seventeen earls, seven countesses, as many bishops, eighteen barons, three-and-thirty baronets, one-and-fifty knights, eighty-three clergymen, who were declared traitors, and adjudged to suffer the pains of death and forfeiture: the individuals subjected to this dreadful proscription were even cut off from all hope of pardon and all benefit of appeal; for, by a clause in the act, the king's pardon was deemed null unless enrolled before the first day of December. A subsequent law was enacted, declaring Ireland independent of the English parliament. This assembly passed another act, granting £20,000 per annum, out of the forfeited estates, to Tyrconnel, in acknowledgement of his signal services: they imposed a tax of £20,000 per month for the service of the king: the royal assent was given to an act for liberty of conscience: they enacted that the tithes payable by papists should be delivered to priests of that communion: the maintenance of the protestant clergy in cities and corporations was taken away; and all dissenters were exempted from ecclesiastical jurisdictions: so that the established church was deprived of all power and prerogative, notwithstanding the express promise of James, who had declared, immediately after his landing, that he would maintain the clergy in their rights and privileges.

40. Nor was the king less arbitrary in the executive part of his government, if we suppose that he countenanced the grievous acts of oppression that were daily committed on the protestant subjects of Ireland: but the tyranny of his proceedings may be justly imputed to the temper of his ministry, consisting of men abandoned to all sense of justice and humanity, who acted from the dictates of rapacity and revenge, inflamed with all the acrimony of religious rancor. Soldiers were permitted to live on free quarter: the people were robbed and plundered: licenses and protections were abused, in order to extort money from the trading part of the nation: the king's old stores were ransacked: the shops of tradesmen and the kitchens of burghers were pillaged to supply the mint with a quantity of brass, which was converted into current coin for his majesty's occasions: an arbitrary value was set on it, and all persons were required and commanded to take it in payment under the severest penalties, though the proportion between its intrinsic worth and currency was nearly as one to three hundred: a vast sum of this counterfeit coin was issued in the course of one year, and forced on the protestants in payment of merchandise, provision, and necessaries for the king's service. James, not content with the supply granted by parliament, imposed by his own authority a tax of £20,000 per month on chattels, as the former was laid on lands: this seems to have been a temporary expedient during the adjournment of the two houses, as the term of the assessment was limited to three months: it was, however, levied by virtue of a commission under the seals; and seems to have been a stretch of prerogative, the less excusable, as he might have obtained the money in a parliamentary way. Understanding that the protestants had laid out all their brass money in purchasing great quantities of hides, tallow, wood, and corn, he assumed the despotic power of fixing the prices of these commodities, and then bought them for his own use. One may see his ministers were bent on the utter destruction of those unhappy people.

41. All vacancies in public schools were supplied with popish teachers; the pension allowed from the exchequer to the university of Dublin was cut off; the vice-provost, fellows, and scholars were expelled; their furniture, plate, and public library were seized without the least shadow of pretence, and in direct violation of a promise the king had made to preserve their privileges and immunities: his officers converted the college into a garrison, the chapel into a magazine, and the apartments into prisons; a popish priest was appointed provost: one Maccarty, of the same persuasion, was made library-keeper; and the whole foundation was changed into a catholic seminary: when bishoprics and benefices in the gift of the crown became vacant, the king ordered the profits to be lodged in the exchequer, and suffered the cures to be totally neglected: the revenues were chiefly employed in the maintenance of Romish bishops and priests, who grew so insolent under this indulgence, that in several places they forcibly seized the protestant churches : when complaint was made of this outrage, the king promised to do justice to the injured, and in some places actually ordered the churches to be restored ; but the popish clergy refused to comply with this order, alleging that in spirituals they owed obedience to no earthly power but the holy see ; and James found himself unable to protect his protestant subjects against a powerful body which he durst not disoblige. Some ships appearing in the bay of Dublin, a proclamation was issued, forbidding the protestants to assemble in any place of worship, or elsewhere, on pain of death : by a second they were commanded to bring in their arms, on pain of being treated as rebels and traitors : Luttrell, governor of Dublin, published an ordinance by beat of drum, requiring the farmers to bring in their corn for his majesty's horses within a certain day, otherwise he would order them to be hanged before their own doors : brigadier Sarsfield commanded all protestants of a certain district to retire to the distance of ten miles from their habitations, on pain of death ; and, in order to keep up the credit of the brass money, the same penalty was denounced, in a proclamation, against any person who should give more than one pound eighteen shillings for a guinea.

42. All the revenues of Ireland, and all the schemes contrived to bolster up the credit of the base coin, would have proved insufficient to support the expenses of the war, had not James received occasional supplies from the French monarch. After the return of the fleet which had conveyed him to Ireland, Louis sent another strong squadron, commanded by Chateau Renault, as a convoy to some transports laden with arms, ammunition, and a large sum of money for the use of king James. Before they sailed from Brest, king William, being informed of their destination, detached admiral Herbert from Spithead with twelve ships of the line, one fire-ship, and four tenders, in order to intercept the enemy. He was driven by stress of weather into Milford-haven, from whence he steered his course to Kinsale, on the supposition that the French fleet had sailed from Brest, and that in all probability he should fall in with them on the coast of Ireland : on the first day of May he discovered them at anchor in Bantry-bay, and stood in to engage them, though they were greatly superior to him in number : they no sooner perceived him at day-break, than they weighed, stood out to windward, formed their line, bore down, and began the action, which was maintained for two hours with equal valor on both sides, though the English fleet sustained considerable damage from the superior fire of the enemy. Herbert tacked several times, in hope of gaining the weather-gage; but the French admiral kept his wind with uncommon skill and perseverance: at length, the English squadron stood off to sea, and maintained a running fight till five in the afternoon, when Chateau Renault tacked about, and returned into the bay, content with the honor he had gained. The loss of men was inconsiderable on both sides; and, where the odds were so great, the victor could not reap much glory: Herbert retired to the isles of Scilly, where he expected a reinforcement; but being disappointed in this expectation, he returned to Portsmouth in very ill humor, with which his officers and men were infected. The common sailors still retained some attachment to James, who had formerly been a favorite among them; and the officers complained that they had been sent on this service with a force so much inferior to that of the enemy.<sup>6</sup> King William, in order to appease their discontent, made an excursion to Portsmouth, where he dined with the admiral on board the ship Elizabeth; declared his intention of creating him an earl, in consideration of his good conduct and services; conferred the honor of knighthood on the captains Ashby and Shovel; and bestowed a donation of ten shillings on every private sailor.

43. The parliament of England thought it incumbent on them, not only to raise supplies for the maintenance of the war in which the nation was involved, but also to do justice with respect to those who had been injured by illegal or oppressive sentences in the late reigns. The attainders of lord Russell, Algernon Sidney, alderman Cornish, and lady Lisle were now reversed: a committee of privileges was appointed by the lords to examine the case of the earl of Devonshire, who in the late reign had been fined £30,000 for assaulting colonel Culpepper in the presence-chamber: they reported that the court of king's-bench, in over-ruling the earl's plea of privilege of parliament, had committed a manifest breach of privilege; that the fine was excessive and exorbitant, against the great charter, the common right of the subject, and the law of the realm. The sentence pronounced on Samuel Johnson, chaplain to lord Russell, in consequence of which he had been degraded, fined, scourged, and set in the pillory, was now annulled, and the commons recommended him to his majesty for some ecclesiastical preferment: he received £1000 in money with a pension of £300 for his own life and that of his son, who was moreover gratified with a place of £100 a year: but the father never obtained any ecclesiastical benefice. Titus Oates seized this opportunity of petitioning the house of lords for a reversal of the judgment given against him on his being convicted of perjury: the opinions of all the judges and counsel at the bar were heard on this subject, and a bill of reversal passed the commons: but the peers having inserted some amendments and a proviso, a conference was demanded, and violent heats ensued: Oates, however, was released from confinement; and the lords, with the consent of the commons, recommended him to his majesty for a pardon, which he obtained, together with a comfortable pension. The committee appointed to inquire into the cases of the state prisoners, found Sir Robert Wright, late lord chief-justice, to have been concerned in the cruelties committed in the west after the insurrection of Monmouth; as also one of the ecclesiastical commissioners, and guilty of manifold enormities: death had by this time delivered Jefferies from the resentment of the nation. Graham and Burton had acted as solicitors in the illegal prosecutions carried on against those who opposed the court in the reign of Charles II.; these were now reported guilty of having been instrumental in taking away the lives and estates of those who had suffered the loss of either under color of law for eight years last past; of having, by malicious indictments, informations, and prosecutions of quo warranto, endeavored the subversion of the protestant religion and the government of the realm; and of having wasted many thousand pounds of the public revenue in the course of their infamous practices.

44. Nor did the misconduct of the present ministry escape the animadversion of the parliament. The lords having addressed the king to put the Isle of Wight, Jersey, Guernsey, Scilly, Dover-castle, and the other fortresses of the kingdom in a posture of defence, and to disarm the papists; empowered a committee to inquire into the miscarriages in Ireland, which were generally imputed to the neglect of the marquises of Carmarthen and Halifax. They presented an address to the king, desiring the minute-book of the committee for Irish affairs might be put into their hands; but his majesty declined gratifying them in this particular: then the commons voted, that those persons who had advised the king to delay this satisfaction were enemies to the kingdom: William, alarmed at this resolution, allowed them to inspect the book, in which they found very little for their purpose. The house resolved that an address should be presented to his majesty, declaring that the succor of Ireland had been retarded by unnecessary delays; that the transports prepared were not sufficient to convey the forces to that kingdom; and that several ships had been taken by the enemy, for want of proper convoy: at the same time the question was put, whether or not they should address the king against the marquis of Halifax; but it was carried in the negative by a small majority. Before this period, Howe, vice-chamberlain to the queen, had moved for an address against such counsellors as had been impeached in parliament, and betrayed the liberties of the nation:—this motion was levelled at Carmarthen and Halifax, the first of whom had been formerly impeached of high treason under the title of earl of Danby; and the other was charged with all the misconduct of the present administration. Warm debates ensued, and in all probability the motion would have been carried in the affirmative, had not those who spoke warmly in behalf of it suddenly cooled in the course of the dispute. Some letters from king James to his partisans being intercepted, and containing some hints of an intended invasion, Mr. Hambden, chairman of the committee of the whole house, enlarged on the imminent danger to which the kingdom was exposed, and moved for a farther supply to his majesty. In this unexpected motion he was not seconded by one member: the house, however, having taken the letters into consideration, resolved to draw up an address to the king, desiring him to secure and disarm all papists of note; and they brought in a bill for attainting several persons in rebellion against their majesties: but it was not finished during this session.

45. Another bill being prepared in the house of lords, enjoining the subjects to wear the woollen manufacture at certain seasons of the year, a petition was presented against it by the silk-weavers of London and Canterbury, assembled in a tumultuous manner at Westminster: the lords refused their petition, because this was an unusual manner of application: they were persuaded to return to their respective places of abode; precautions were taken against a second riot; and the bill was unanimously rejected in the upper house. This parliament passed an act, vesting in the two universities the presentations belonging to papists; those of the southern counties being given to Oxford, and those of the northern to Cambridge, on certain specified conditions: courts of conscience were erected at Bristol, Gloucester, and Newcastle; and that of the marches of Wales was abolished, as an intolerable oppression: the protestant clergymen, who had been forced to leave their benefices in Ireland, were rendered capable of holding any living in England, without forfeiting their title to their former preferment; with the proviso that they should resign their English benefices when restored to those they had been obliged to relinquish. The statute of Henry IV. against multiplying gold and silver was now repealed: the subjects were allowed to melt and refine metals and ores, and extract gold and silver from them, on condition that it should be brought to the mint, and converted into money, the owner receiving its full value in current coin. These, and several other bills of smaller importance being passed, the two houses adjourned to the twentieth day of September, and afterwards to the nineteenth day of October.

1. THOUGH the affairs of Ireland were extremely pressing, and the protestants of that country had made repeated application for relief, the succors were retarded either by disputes among the ministers, or the neglect of those who had the management of the expedition, in such a manner, that king James had been six months in Ireland before the army was embarked for that kingdom: at length, eighteen regiments of infantry and five of dragoons being raised for that service, a train of artillery provided, and transports prepared, the duke of Schomberg, on whom king William had conferred the chief command of this armament, set out for Chester, after he had in person thanked the commons for the uncommon regard they had paid to his services, and received assurances from the house that they would pay particular attention to him and his army. On the thirteenth day of August he landed in the neighborhood of Carrickfergus with about 10,000 foot and dragoons, and took possession of Belfast, from whence the enemy retired at his approach to Carrickfergus, where they resolved to make a stand: the duke, having refreshed his men, marched thither, and invested the place; the siege was carried on till the twenty-sixth day of the month, when the breaches being practicable, the besieged capitulated, on condition of marching out with their arms, and as much baggage as they could carry on their backs; and of their being conducted to the next Irish garrison, which was at Newry. During this siege the duke was joined by the rest of his army from England; but he had left orders for conveying the greater part of the artillery and stores from Chester directly to Carlingford: he now began his march through Lisburn and Hillsborough, and encamped at Dromore, where the protestants of the north had been lately routed by Hamilton: thence he proceeded to Loughbrillane, where he was joined by the horse and dragoons of Inniskillin: then the enemy abandoned Newry and Dundalk, in the neighborhood of which Schomberg encamped on a low, damp ground, having the town and river on the south, and surrounded on every other part by hills, bogs, and mountains.

2. His army, consisting chiefly of new-raised men little inured to hardship, began to flag under the fatigue of marching, the inclemency of the weather, and scarcity of provision: here he was reinforced by the regiments of Kirke, Hanmer, and Stuart; and would have continued his march to Drogheda, where he understood Rosene lay with about 20,000 men, had he not been obliged to wait for the artillery, which was not yet arrived at Carlingford. King James, having assembled all his forces, advanced towards Schomberg, and appeared before his intrenchments in order of battle; but the duke, knowing they were greatly superior in number of horse, and that his own army was undisciplined, and weakened by death and sickness, restrained his men within the lines, and in a little time the enemy retreated. Immediately after their departure, a conspiracy was discovered in the English camp, hatched by some French papists, who had insinuated themselves into the protestant regiments: one of these, whose name was Du Plessis, had written a letter to the ambassador D'Avaux, promising to desert with all the papists of the French regiments in Schomberg's army: this letter being found, Du Plessis and five accomplices were tried by a court-martial and executed. About 250 papists being discovered in the French regiments, they were sent over to England, from thence to Holland. While Schomberg remained in this situation, the Inniskilliners made excursions in the neighborhood, under the command of colonel Lloyd; and on the twenty-seventh day of September they obtained a complete victory over five times their number of the Irish: they killed 700 on the spot, and took O'Kelly their commander, with about fifty officers, and a considerable booty of cattle. The duke was so pleased with their behavior on this occasion, that they received a very honorable testimony of his approbation.

3. Meanwhile, the enemy took possession of James-Town, and reduced Sligo, one of the forts of which was gallantly defended by St. Sauver, a French captain, and his company of grenadiers, until he was obliged to capitulate for want of water and provision. A contagious distemper still continued to rage in Schomberg's camp, and swept off a great number of officers and soldiers; so that in the beginning of next spring, not above half the number of those who went over with the general remained alive: he was censured for his inactivity; and the king, in repeated letters, desired him to hazard an engagement, provided any opportunity should occur; but he did not think proper to run the risk of a battle against an enemy that was above thrice his number, well-disciplined, healthy, and conducted by able officers: nevertheless, he was certainly blamable for having chosen such an unwholesome situation. At the approach of winter he retired into quarters, in hopes of being reinforced with 7000 Danes, who had already arrived in Britain: these auxiliaries were stipulated in a treaty which William had just concluded with the king of Denmark. The English were not more successful at sea than they had proved in their operations by land: admiral Herbert, now created earl of Torrington, having sailed to Ireland with the combined squadrons of England and Holland, made a fruitless attempt on Cork, and lost a great number of seamen by sickness, which was imputed to bad provision: the Dartmouth ship of war fell into the hands of the enemy, who infested the channel with such a number of armed ships and privateers, that the trade of England sustained incredible damage.

4. The affairs of France wore but a gloomy aspect on the continent, where all the powers of Europe seemed to have conspired her destruction: king William had engaged in a new league with the States-General, in which former treaties of peace and commerce were confirmed. It was stipulated, that in case the king of Great-Britain should be attacked, the Dutch should assist him with 6000 infantry and twenty ships of the line; and that provided hostilities should be committed against the States-General, England should supply them with 10,000 infantry and twenty ships of war. This treaty was no sooner ratified, than king William despatched lord Churchill, whom he had by this time created earl of Marlborough, to Holland, in order to command the British auxiliaries in that service, to the number of 11,000, the greater part of which had been in the army of king James when the prince of Orange landed in England: the earl forthwith joined the Dutch army, under the command of prince Waldeck, who had fixed his rendezvous in the county of Liege, with a view to act against the French army commanded by the mareschal D'Humieres; while the prince of Vaudemont headed a little army of observation, consisting of Spaniards, Dutch, and Germans, to watch the motions of Calvo in another part of the Low-Countries. The city of Liege was compelled to renounce the neutrality, and declare for the allies: mareschal D'Humieres attacked the foragers belonging to the army of the States at Walcourt, in the month of August; an obstinate engagement ensued, and the French were obliged to retreat in confusion with the loss of 2000 men and some pieces of artillery. The army of observation levelled part of the French lines on the side of Courtray, and raised contributions on the territories of the enemy.

5. The French were almost intire masters of the three ecclesiastical electorates of Germany: they possessed Mentz,

Triers, Bonne, Keiserswaert, Philipsburg, and Landau : they had blown up the castle of Heidelberg in the palatinate, and destroyed Manheim : they had reduced Worms and Spiers to ashes ; and demolished Frankendahl, together with several other fortresses. These conquests, the fruits of sudden invasion, were covered with a numerous army, commanded by the mareschal de Duras ; and all his inferior generals were officers of distinguished courage and ability : nevertheless, he found it difficult to maintain his ground against the different princes of the empire. The duke of Lorrain, who commanded the imperial troops, invested Mentz, and took it by capitulation : the elector of Brandenburg, having reduced Keiserswaert, undertook the siege of Bonne, which the garrison surrendered, after having made a long and vigorous defence. Nothing contributed more to the union of the German princes than their resentment of the shocking barbarity with which the French had plundered, wasted, and depopulated their country. Louis having, by his intrigues in Poland and at Constantinople, prevented a pacification between the emperor and the Ottoman Porte, the campaign was opened in Croatia, where 5000 Turks were defeated by a body of Croats between Vihitz and Novi : the prince of Baden, who commanded the imperialists on that side, having thrown a bridge over the Morava at Passarowitz, crossed that river, and marched in quest of the Turkish army, amounting to 50,000 men, headed by a seraskier : on the thirtieth day of August he attacked the enemy in the intrenchments near Patochin, and forced their lines, routed them with great slaughter, and took possession of their camp, baggage, and artillery. They retreated to Nissa, where the general finding them still more numerous than the imperialists, resolved to make a stand ; and encamped in a situation that was inaccessible in every part except the rear, which he left open for the convenience of a retreat. Through this avenue, he was, on the twenty-fourth day of September, attacked by the prince of Baden, who, after a desperate resistance, obtained another complete victory, enriched his troops with the spoils of the enemy, and entered Nissa without opposition : there he found above 3000 horses and a vast quantity of provision. Having reposed his army for a few days in this place, he resumed his march against the Turks, who had chosen an advantageous post at Widen, and seemed ambitious of retrieving the honor they had lost in the two former engagements. The Germans attacked their lines without hesitation ; and though the Mussulmen fought with incredible fury, they were a third time defeated with great slaughter. This defeat was attended with the loss of Widen, which being surrendered to the victor, he distributed his troops in winter-quarters, and returned to Vienna covered with laurels.

6. The French were likewise baffled in their attempt on Catalonia, where the duke de Noailles had taken Campredon, in the month of May. Leaving a garrison in this place, he retreated to the frontiers of France, while the duke de Villa Hermosa, at the head of a Spanish army, blocked up the place, and laid Roussillon under contribution : he afterwards undertook the siege in form, and Noailles marched to its relief ; but he was so hard pressed by the Spaniards, that he withdrew the garrison, dismantled the place, and retreated with great precipitation. The French king hoped to derive some considerable advantage from the death of pope Innocent XI. which happened on the twelfth day of August : that pontiff had been an inveterate enemy to Louis ever since the affair of the franchises, and the seizure of Avignon : <sup>9</sup> cabals were immediately formed at Rome by the French faction against the Spanish and imperial interest. The French cardinals de Bouillon and Bonzi, accompanied by Furstemberg, repaired to Rome with a large sum of money. Peter Ottoboni, a Venetian, was elected pope, and assumed the name of Alexander VIII.: the duke de Chaulnes, ambassador from France, immediately signified, in the name of his master, that Avignon should be restored to the patrimony of the church; and Louis renounced the franchises, in a letter written by his own hand to the new pontiff. Alexander received these marks of respect with the warmest acknowledgements; but, when the ambassador and Furstemberg besought him to re-examine the election of the bishop of Cologne, which had been the source of so much calamity to the empire, he lent a deaf ear to their solicitations: he even confirmed the dispensations granted by his predecessor to the prince of Bavaria, who was thus empowered to take possession of the electorate though he had not yet attained the age required by the canons. Furstemberg retired in disgust to Paris, where Louis immediately gratified him with the abbey of St. Germain.

<sup>9</sup> The franchises were privileges of asylum, annexed not only to the houses of ambassadors at Rome, but even to the whole district in which any ambassador chanced to live : this privilege was become a terrible nuisance, inasmuch as it afforded protection to the most atrocious criminals, who filled this city with rapine and murder. Innocent XI. resolving to remove this evil, published a bull, abolishing the franchises ; and almost all the catholic powers of Europe acquiesced in what he had done, on being duly informed of the grievance : Louis XIV. however, from a spirit of pride and insolence, refused to part with any thing that looked like a prerogative of his crown : he said, the king of France was not the imitator, but a pattern and example for other princes : he rejected with disdain the mild representations of the pope ; he sent the marquis de Laverden as his ambassador to Rome, with a formidable train, to insult Innocent even in his own city : that nobleman swaggered through the streets of Rome like a bravo, taking all opportunities to affront the pope, who excommunicated him in revenge. On the other hand, the parliament of Paris appealed from the pope's bull to a future council : Louis caused the pope's nuncio to be put under arrest, took possession of Avignon, which belonged to the see of Rome, and set the holy father at defiance.

7. King William found it an easier task to unite the councils of Europe against the common enemy than to conciliate and preserve the affections of his own subjects, among whom he began visibly to decline in point of popularity: many were dissatisfied with his measures; and a great number even of those who exerted themselves for his elevation, had conceived a disgust from his personal deportment, which was very unsuitable to the manners and disposition of the English people. Instead of mingling with his nobility in social amusements and familiar conversation, he maintained a disagreeable reserve, which had all the air of sullen pride; he seldom or never spoke to his courtiers or attendants; he spent his time chiefly in the closet, retired from all communication; or among his troops, in a camp he had formed at Hounslow; or in the exercise of hunting, to which he was immoderately addicted: this had been prescribed to him by physicians as necessary to improve his constitution, which was naturally weak; and by practice had become so habitual, that he could not lay it aside. His ill health cooperating with his natural aversion to society, produced a peevishness, which could not fail of being displeasing to those who were near his person; this was increased by the disputes in his cabinet, and the opposition of those who were professed enemies to his government, as well as by the alienation of his former friends: as he could not breathe without difficulty in the air of London, he resided chiefly at Hampton-court, and expended considerable sums in beauti-

fyng and enlarging that palace : he likewise purchased the house at Kensington of the earl of Nottingham ; and such profusion, in the beginning of an expensive war, gave umbrage to the nation in general. Whether he was advised by his counsellors, or his own sagacity pointed out the expediency of conforming with the English humor, he now seemed to change his disposition, and in some measure adopt the manners of his predecessors : in imitation of Charles II. he resorted to the races at Newmarket ; he accepted an invitation to visit Cambridge, where he behaved himself with remarkable affability to the members of the university ; he afterwards dined with the lord-mayor of London, accepted the freedom of the city, and condescended so far as to become sovereign-master of the company of grocers.

8. While William thus endeavored to remove the prejudices which had been conceived against his person, the period arrived which the parliament had prescribed for taking the oaths to the new government : some individuals of the clergy sacrificed their benefices to their scruples of conscience ; and absolutely refused to take oaths that were contrary to those they had already sworn in favor of their late sovereign : these were distinguished by the epithet of Nonjurors ; but their number bore a very small proportion to that of others, who took them with such reservations and distinctions as redounded very little to the honor of their integrity : many of those who had been the warmest advocates for non-resistance and passive obedience made no scruple of renouncing their allegiance to king James, and complying with the present act, after having declared that they took the oaths in no other sense than that of a peaceable submission to the powers that were : they even affirmed that the legislature itself had allowed the distinction between a king de facto and a king de jure, as they had dropped the word 'rightful,' when the form was under debate : they alleged that as prudence obliged them to conform to the letter of the oath, so conscience required them to give it their own interpretation. Nothing could be more infamous and of worse tendency, than this practice of equivocating in the most sacred of all obligations : it introduced a general disregard of oaths, which has been the source of universal perjury and corruption. Though this set of temporisers were bitterly upbraided both by the nonjurors and the papists, they all concurred in representing William as an enemy to the church ; as a prince educated in the doctrines of Calvin, which he plainly espoused, by limiting his favor and preferment to such as were latitudinarians in religion ; and by his abolishing episcopacy in Scotland. The presbyterians of that kingdom now tyrannised in their turn : they were headed by the earl of Crawford, a nobleman of a violent temper and strong prejudices : he was chosen president of the parliament by the interest of Melvil ; and oppressed the episcopalians in such a manner, that the greater part of them, from resentment, became well-wishers to king James : every circumstance of the hardships they underwent was reported in England ; and the earl of Clarendon, as well as the suspended bishops, circulated these particulars with great assiduity. The oaths being rejected by the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Ely, Chichester, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, and Gloucester, they were suspended from their functions, and threatened with deprivation : Lake of Chichester, being seized with a dangerous distemper, signed a solemn declaration, in which he professed his adherence to the doctrine of non-resistance and passive obedience, which he believed to be the distinguishing characteristic of the church of England. After his death this paper was published, industriously circulated, and extolled by the party as an inspired oracle pronounced by a martyr to religious truth and sincerity.

9. All the clamor that was raised against the king could not divert him from prosecuting the scheme of comprehension : he granted a commission under the great seal to ten bishops, and twenty dignitaries of the church, authorising them to meet from time to time in the Jerusalem-chamber, to prepare such alteration of the liturgy and the canons, and such proposals for the reformation of ecclesiastical courts, as might most conduce to the good order, edification, and uniting of the church, and tend to reconcile all religious differences among the protestant subjects of the kingdom. A cry was immediately raised against this commission, as an ecclesiastical court illegal and dangerous. At their first meeting, the authority of the commission was questioned by Sprat, bishop of Rochester, who retired in disgust, and was followed by Mew of Winchester, and the doctors Jane and Aldrich : these were averse to any alteration of the forms and constitution of the church in favor of an insolent and obstinate party, which ought to have been satisfied with the toleration they enjoyed : they observed, that an attempt to make such alteration would divide the clergy, and bring the liturgy into disesteem with the people, as it would be a plain acknowledgement that it wanted correction: they thought they should violate the dignity of the church, by condescending to make offers, which the dissenters were at liberty to refuse; and they suspected some of their colleagues of a design to give up episcopal ordination;—a step inconsistent with their honor, duty, oaths, and subscriptions.

10. The commissioners, notwithstanding this secession, proceeded to debate with moderation on the abuses of which the dissenters had complained, and corrected every article that seemed liable to any just objection; but the opposite party employed all their art and industry to inflame the minds of the people. The two universities declared against all alterations, and those who promoted them: the king himself was branded as an enemy to the hierarchy; and they bestirred themselves so successfully in the election of members for the convocation, that they procured a very considerable majority. At their first meeting, the friends of the comprehension scheme proposed Dr. Tillotson, clerk of the closet to his majesty, as prolocutor; but the other party carried it in favor of Dr. Jane, who was counted the most violent churchman in the whole assembly; in a Latin speech to the bishop of London as president, he, in the name of the lower house, asserted that the liturgy of England needed no amendment; and concluded with the old declaration of the barons,—Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari: ‘we will not suffer the laws of England to be changed.’ The bishop, in his reply, exhorted them to moderation, charity, and indulgence towards their brethren the dissenters, and to make such abatements in things indifferent as might serve to open a door of salvation to multitudes of straying christians: his injunctions, however, produced no favorable effect: the lower house seemed to be animated by a spirit of opposition. Next day the president prorogued them, on pretence that the royal commission, by which they were to act, was defective for want of being sealed, and that a prorogation was necessary until that sanction should be obtained: in this interval means were used to mollify their non-compliant tempers; but all endeavors proved ineffectual: when they met again, the earl of Nottingham delivered the king’s commission to both houses, with a speech of his own, and a message from his majesty, importing, that he had summoned them out of a pious zeal to do every thing that might tend to the best establishment of the church of England, which should always enjoy his favor and protection : he exhorted them to lay aside all prejudice, and consider calmly and impartially whatever should be proposed : he assured them he would offer nothing but what should be for the honor, peace, and advantage of the protestant religion in general, and particularly of the church of England.

11. The bishops, adjourning to the Jerusalem-chamber, prepared a zealous address of thanks to his majesty, which, being sent to the lower house for their concurrence, met with violent opposition : amendments were proposed ; a conference ensued ; and, after warm debates, they agreed on a cold address, which was accordingly presented. The majority of the lower house, far from taking any measures in favor of dissenters, converted all their attention to the relief of their nonjuring brethren : zealous speeches were made in behalf of the suspended bishops ; and Dr. Jane proposed that something might be done to qualify them to sit in the convocation : this, however, was such a dangerous point, as they would not venture to discuss ; yet, rather than proceed on the business for which they had been assembled, they began to take cognisance of some pamphlets lately published, which they conceived to be of dangerous consequence to the christian religion. The president and his party, perceiving the disposition of the house, did not think proper to communicate any proposal touching the intended reformation, and the king suffered the session to be discontinued by repeated prorogations.

12. The parliament meeting on the nineteenth day of October, the king, in a speech of his own composing, explained the necessity of a present supply to carry on the war : he desired that they might be speedy in their determinations on this subject, for these would in a great measure influence the deliberations of the princes and states concerned in the war against France ; as a general meeting of them was appointed to be held next month at the Hague, to settle the operations of the ensuing campaign : he concluded with recommending the despatch of a bill of indemnity, that the minds of his subjects might be quieted, and that they might unanimously concur in promoting the honor and welfare of the kingdom. As several inflammatory bills and disputes, which had produced heats and animosities in the last session, were still depending, the king, after having consulted both houses, resolved to put an end to those disputes by a prorogation : he accordingly went to the house of lords, and prorogued the parliament till the twenty-first day of October, by the mouth of the new speaker, Sir Robert Atkins, the marquis of Halifax having resigned that office : when they re-assembled, the king referred them to his former speech ; then the commons unanimously resolved to assist his majesty in reducing Ireland, and in joining with his allies abroad for a vigorous prosecution of the war against France : for these purposes they voted a supply of £2,000,000.

13. During this session the whigs employed all their influence and intrigues in obstructing the bill of indemnity, which they knew would open a door for favor and preferment to the opposite party, which began to gain ground in the king's good graces : with this view they revived the prosecution of the state prisoners : a committee was appointed to prepare a charge against Burton and Graham. The commons resolved to impeach the earls of Peterborough, Salisbury, and Castlemaine, Sir Edward Hales, and Obadiah Walker, of high treason, for having been reconciled to the church of Rome, contrary to the laws of the realm : a bill was ordered to be brought in, to declare the estate of the late lord chancellor Jefferies forfeited to the crown, and attain his blood ; but it met with such opposition, that the measure was dropped ; the house however agreed, that the pecuniary penalties incurred by those persons who had exercised offices contrary to the laws against popish recusants should be speedily levied, and applied to the public service. The lord Griffin being detected in maintaining a correspondence with king James and his partisans, was committed to the Tower ; but, as no other evidence appeared against him than written letters, found in the false bottom of a pewter bottle, they could not help consenting to his being released on bail, as they had lately resolved that Algernon Sidney was unjustly condemned in the reign of Charles II. because nothing but writings had been produced against him at his trial. The two houses concurred in appointing a committee to inquire who were the advisers and prosecutors in taking away the lives of lord Russell, Colonel Sidney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Alderman Cornish, and others ; and who were chiefly concerned in the arbitrary practices touching the writs of quo warranto, and the surrender of charters. This inquiry was levelled at the marquis of Halifax, who had concurred with the ministry of Charles in all these severities : though no proof appeared, on which votes or addresses could be founded, that nobleman saw it was necessary for him to withdraw himself from the administration; he therefore resigned the privy-seal, which was put in commission, and reconciled himself to the tories, of whom he became the patron and protector.

14. The commons likewise resumed the examination of the miscarriages in Ireland, and desired the king would appoint commissioners to go over and inquire into the condition of the army in that kingdom. Schomberg, understanding that he had been blamed in the house of commons for his inactivity, transmitted to the king a satisfactory vindication of his own conduct; and it appeared that the miscarriages in Ireland were wholly owing to John Shales, purveyor-general to the army: the commons immediately presented an address to his majesty, praying that Shales might be taken into custody; that all his papers, accounts, and stores should be secured; and that duke Schomberg might be empowered to fill his place with a more able purveyor: the king gave them to understand that he had already sent orders to the general for that purpose: nevertheless, they in another petition requested his majesty to name those who had recommended Shales to his service; as he had exercised the same office under king James, and was suspected of treasonable practices against the government: William declined gratifying their request; but he afterwards sent a message to the house, desiring them to recommend a certain number of commissioners to superintend such provisions and preparations as might be necessary for that service, as well as to nominate certain persons to go over and examine the state of the army in Ireland. The commons were so mollified by this instance of his condescension, that they left the whole affair to his own direction, and proceeded to examine other branches of misconduct: instances of mismanagement appeared so numerous and so flagrant, that they resolved on a subsequent address, to explain the ill conduct and success of his army and navy; to desire he would find out the authors of these miscarriages; and for the future entrust unsuspected persons with the management of affairs: they ordered the victuallers of the fleet to be taken into custody, on suspicion of their having furnished the navy with unwholesome provisions; and new commissioners were appointed. Bitter reproaches were thrown out against the ministry: Mr. Hambden expressed his surprise that the administration should consist of those very persons whom king James had employed, when his affairs were desperate, to treat with the prince of Orange; and moved that the king should be petitioned in an address to remove such persons from his presence and councils. This was a stroke aimed at the earl of Nottingham, whose office of secretary Hambden desired to possess; but his motion was not seconded, the court-members observing that James did not depute those lords to the prince of Orange because they were attached to his own interest, but for a very different reason, namely, that they were well known to disapprove of his measures, and therefore would be the more agreeable to his highness: the house, however, voted an address to the king, desiring that the authors of the miscarriages might be brought to condign punishment.

15. In the sequel, the question was proposed, whether a placeman ought to have a seat in the house; and a very warm debate ensued; but it was carried in the affirmative, on the supposition that by such exclusion the commonwealth would be deprived of some of the ablest senators of the kingdom: but what chiefly irritated William against the whigs was their backwardness in promoting the public service, and their disregard of the earnest desire he expressed to see his revenue settled for life. He said, his title was no more than a pageant; and the worst of all governments was that of a king without treasure: nevertheless, they would not grant the civil list for a longer term than one year: they began to think there was something arbitrary in his disposition: his sullen behavior, in all probability, first infused this opinion, which was strengthened and confirmed by the insinuations of his enemies. The Scots, who had come up to London to give an account of the proceedings in their parliament, were infected with the same notion: one Simpson, a presbyterian of that country, whom the earl of Portland employed as a spy, had insinuated himself into the confidence of Nevil Payne, an active and intelligent partisan and agent of king James; by which means he supplied the earl with such intelligence as raised him to some degree of credit with that minister: this he used in prepossessing the earl against the king's best friends, and infusing jealousies which were soon kindled into mutual distrust and animosity.

16. Sir James Montgomery, who had been a warm advocate for the revolution, received advice that the court

suspected him and others of disaffection, and was employed in seeking evidence by which they might be prosecuted: they were equally alarmed and incensed at this intimation; and Payne seized the opportunity of seducing them into a correspondence with the exiled king. They demanded the settlement of presbytery in Scotland, and actually engaged in a treaty for his restoration: they reconciled themselves to the duke of Queensbury and the other noblemen of the episcopal party: they wrote to James for a supply of money, arms, and ammunition, together with a reinforcement of 3000 men from Dunkirk. Montgomery had acquired great interest among the whigs of England, and this he employed in animating them against the king and the ministry: he represented them as a set of wicked men, who employed infamous spies to ensnare and ruin the fast friends of the government; and found means to alienate them so much from William, that they began to think in earnest of recalling their banished prince: the duke of Bolton and the earl of Monmouth were almost persuaded into a conspiracy for this purpose; they seemed to think James was now so well convinced of his former errors, that they might trust him without scruple: Montgomery and Payne were the chief managers of the scheme, and they admitted Ferguson into their councils, as a veteran in the arts of treason. In order to blast William's credit in the city, they circulated a report that James would grant a full indemnity, separate himself intirely from the French interest, and be contented with a secret connivance in favor of the Roman catholics. Montgomery's brother assured the bishop of Salisbury, that a treaty with king James was absolutely concluded, and an invitation subscribed by the whole cabal: he said this paper would be sent to Ireland by the way of France, as the direct communication was difficult; and he proposed a method for seizing it before it should be conveyed out of the kingdom. Williamson, the supposed bearer of it, had obtained a pass for Flanders; and a messenger being sent in pursuit of him, secured his clothes and portmanteau; but, after a very strict examination, nothing appeared to justify the intelligence: Williamson had previously delivered the papers to Simpson, who hired a boat at Deal, and arrived in safety at France: he returned with large assurances, and £12,000 were remitted to the Scottish undertakers. Montgomery, the informer, seeing his intelligence falsified, lost his credit with the bishop; and dreading the resentment of the other party, retired to the continent; the conspirators loudly complained of the false imputations they had incurred: the pretended discoveries were looked on as fictions of the ministry, and the king on this occasion suffered greatly in the opinion of his subjects.

17. The tories still continued to carry on a secret negotiation with the court: they took advantage of the ill humor subsisting between the king and the whigs; and promised large supplies of money provided this parliament should be dissolved, and another immediately convoked. The opposite party, being apprised of their intention, brought a bill into the house of commons for restoring corporations to their ancient rights and privileges; they knew their own strength at elections consisted in these corporations; and they inserted two additional severe clauses against those who were in any shape concerned in surrendering charters: the whole power of the tories was exerted against this clause; and now the whigs vied with them in making court to his majesty, promising to manifest the most submissive obedience should this bill be enacted into a law: the strength of the tories was now become so formidable in the house, that they outvoted the other party, and the clauses were rejected; but the bill passed in its original form. The lords debated on the point, whether a corporation could be forfeited or surrendered: lord chief justice Holt and two other judges declared their opinion in the affirmative; the rest thought otherwise, as no precedents could be produced farther back than the reign of Henry VIII. when the abbey's were surrendered; and this instance seemed too violent to authorise such a measure in a regular course of administration; the bill, however, passed by one voice only: then both parties quickened their applications to the king, who found himself so perplexed and distracted between two factions which he equally feared, that he resolved to leave the government in the queen's hands, and retire into Holland: he communicated this design to the marquis of Carmarthen, the earl of Shrewsbury, and some other noblemen, who pressed him to lay aside his resolution, and even mingled tears with their remonstrances.

18. He at length complied with their request, and determined to finish the Irish war in person. This design was far from being agreeable to the parliament: his friends dreaded the climate of that country, which might prove fatal to his weak constitution: the well-wishers of James were afraid of that prince's being hard pressed, should William take the field against him in person : both houses, therefore, began to prepare an address against this expedition. In order to prevent this remonstrance, the king went to the parliament, and formally signified his resolution : after his speech, they were prorogued to the second of April : on the sixth of February they were dissolved by proclamation, and a new parliament was summoned to meet on the twentieth of March. During this session the commons, in an address to the king, desired that a revenue of £50,000 might be settled on the prince and princess of Denmark out of the civil list, and his majesty gratified them in this particular : yet, the warmth and industry with which the friends of the princess exerted themselves in promoting the settlement produced a coldness and misunderstanding between the two sisters, and the subsequent disgrace of the earl of Marlborough was imputed to the part which his wife acted on the occasion : she was lady of the bed-chamber, and chief confidant of the princess, whom she strenuously advised to insist on the settlement, rather than depend on the generosity of the king and queen.

19. About this period, general Ludlow, who at the Restoration had been excepted from the act of indemnity, as one of those who sat in judgment on Charles I. arrived in England, and offered his service in reducing Ireland, where he had formerly commanded. Though a rigid republican, he was reputed a conscientious man and a good officer : he had received some encouragement to come over, and probably would have been employed had not the commons interposed. Sir Edward Seymour, who enjoyed by grant an estate in Wiltshire, which had formerly belonged to Ludlow, began to be in pain for his possession : he observed in the house, that the nation would be disgraced, should one of the parricides be suffered to live in the kingdom. An address was immediately presented to the king, desiring a proclamation might be issued, promising a reward for apprehending general Ludlow : this was accordingly published ; but not before he had landed in Holland, whence he returned to Vevay in Switzerland, where he wrote the memoirs of his life, and died after an exile of thirty years.

20. While king William fluctuated between two parties in England, his interest in Scotland had well nigh given way to a coalition between the original Jacobites and Montgomery's party of discontented presbyterians. Colonel Cannon, who succeeded the viscount Dundee in command, after having made several unsuccessful efforts in favor of the late king's interest, retired into Ireland; and the highlanders chose Sir Hugh Cameron for their leader: under him they renewed their incursions with the better prospect of success, as several regiments of the regular troops had been sent to reinforce the army of Schomberg: James assisted them with clothes, arms, and ammunition, together with some officers, amongst whom was colonel Buchan, appointed to act as their chief commander. This officer, at the head of 1500 men, advanced into the shire of Murray, in hope of being joined by other malcontents; but he was surprised and routed by Sir Thomas Livingstone, while major Ferguson destroyed the places they possessed in the isle of Mull; so that the highlanders were obliged to retire, and conceal themselves among their hills and fastnesses. The friends of James, despairing of doing any thing effectual for his service in the field, converted all their attention to the proceedings in parliament, where they imagined their interest was much stronger than it appeared to be on trial: they took the oaths without hesitation, and hoped, by the assistance of their new allies, to embroil the government in such a manner, that the majority of the people would declare for a restoration: but the views of these new-cemented parties were altogether incompatible, and their principles diametrically opposite. Notwithstanding their concurrence in parliament, the earl of Melvil procured a small majority: the opposition was immediately discouraged; some individuals retracted, rather than fall with a sinking cause; and mutual jealousies began to prevail: the leaders of the coalition treated separately with king James; made inconsistent demands; reciprocally concealed their negotiations; in a word, they distrusted and hated one another with the most implacable resentment.

21. The earls of Argyle, Annandale, and Breadalbane withdrew from their councils, and repaired to England: Montgomery, terrified at their defection, went privately to London, after he had hinted something of the plot to Melvil, and solicited a pass from the queen, which was refused: Annandale, having received information that Montgomery had disclosed all the particulars of the negotiation, threw himself on the queen's mercy, and discovered all he knew of the conspiracy: as he had not treated with any of the malcontents in England, they remained secure from his evidence; but he informed against Nevil Payne, who had been sent down as their agent to Scotland, where he now resided: he was immediately apprehended by the council of that kingdom, in consequence of a letter from the earl of Nottingham; and twice put to the torture, which he resolutely bore, without discovering his employers: Montgomery still absconded in London, soliciting a pardon; but, finding he could not obtain it, except on condition of making a full discovery, he abandoned his country, and chose to die in exile rather than betray his confederates. This disunion of the conspirators and discovery of the plot left the earl of Melvil in possession of a greater majority; though even this he was fain to secure by overstraining his instructions in the articles of patronage and the supremacy of the crown, which he yielded up to the fury of the fanatic presbyterians, contrary to the intention of king William: in lieu of these, however, they indulged him with the tax of chimney or hearth-money; as well as with a test to be imposed on all persons in office and parliament, declaring William and Mary their lawful sovereigns, and renouncing the pretended title of king James. All the laws in favor of episcopacy were repealed: threescore of the presbyterian ministers, who had been ejected at the restoration, were still alive; and these the parliament declared the only sound part of the church: the government of it was lodged in their hands; and they were empowered to admit such as they should think proper to their assistance. A few furious fanatics being thus associated, proceeded with ungovernable violence to persecute the episcopal party, exercising the very same tyranny against which they themselves had so loudly exclaimed.

22. While the presbyterian interest thus triumphed in Scotland, the two parties that divided England employed their whole influence and attention in managing the elections for a new parliament: and the tories obtained the victory. [1690.] The king seemed gradually falling into the arms of this party: they complained of their having been totally excluded from the lieutenancy of London at the king's accession to the crown; and now a considerable number of the most violent tories in the city were admitted into the commission by the interest and address of the bishop of London, the marquis of Carmarthen, and the earl of Nottingham: to gratify that party, the earls of Monmouth and Warrington were dismissed from their employments: nay, when the parliament met on the twentieth of March, the commons chose for their speaker Sir John Trevor, a violent partisan of that faction, who had been created master of the rolls by the late king.<sup>10</sup> He was a bold, artful man, and undertook to procure a majority to be at the devotion of the court, provided he should be supplied with the necessary sums for the purposes of corruption: William, finding there was no other way of maintaining his administration in peace, thought proper to countenance the practice of purchasing votes, and appointed Trevor first commissioner of the great seal. In his speech to the new parliament, he gave them to understand that he still persisted in his resolution of going in person to Ireland: he desired they would make a settlement of the revenue, or establish it for the present, as a fund of credit, on which the necessary sums for the service of the government might be immediately advanced: he signified his intention of sending to them an act of grace, with a few exceptions, that he might manifest his readiness to extend his protection to all his subjects, and leave no color of excuse for raising disturbances in his absence, as he knew how busy some ill-affected men were in their endeavors to alter the established government; he recommended a union with Scotland, the parliament of which had appointed commissioners for that purpose: he told them he should leave the administration in the hands of the queen, and desired they would prepare an act to confirm her authority: he exhorted them to despatch the business for which they were assembled, to avoid debates, and expressed his hope that they should soon meet again to finish what might be now left imperfect.

23. The commons, in compliance with his request, voted a supply of £1,200,000, £1,000,000 of that sum to be raised by a clause of credit in the revenue-bills; but he could not prevail on them to settle the revenue for life: they granted, however, the hereditary excise for that term, but the customs for four years only: they considered this short term as the best security the kingdom could have for frequent parliaments; though this precaution was not at all agreeable to their sovereign: a poll-bill was likewise passed; other supplies were granted; and both parties seemed to court his majesty, by advancing money on those funds of credit. The whigs, however, had another battery in reserve: they produced, in the upper house, a bill for recognising their majesties as the rightful and lawful sovereigns of these realms, and for declaring all the acts of the last parliament to be good and valid. The tories were now reduced to a very perplexed situation : they could not oppose the bill without hazarding the interest they had so lately acquired ; nor assent to it without solemnly renouncing their former arguments and distinctions : they made no great objections to the first part, and even proposed to enact that those should be deemed good laws for the time to come ; but they refused to declare them valid for that which was past. After a long debate, the bill was committed ; yet the whigs lost their majority on the report : nevertheless, the bill was recovered, and passed with some alteration in the words, in consequence of a nervous, spirited protest, signed Bolton, Macclesfield, Stamford, Newport, Bedford, Herbert, Suffolk, Monmouth, Delamere, and Oxford : the whole interest of the court was thrown into the scale with this bill, before it would preponderate against the tories, the chiefs of whom, with the earl of Nottingham at their head, protested in their turn. The same party in the house of commons were determined on a vigorous opposition ; and in the mean time some trifling objections were made, that it might be committed for amendment ; but their design was prematurely discovered by one of their faction, who chanced to question the legality of the convention, as it was not summoned by the king's writ : this insinuation was answered by Somers, the solicitor-general, who observed, that if it was not a legal parliament, they who were then met, and who had taken the oaths enacted by that parliament, were guilty of high-treason ; the laws repealed by it were still in force ; it was their duty, therefore, to return to king James, and all concerned in collecting and paying the money levied by the acts of that parliament were highly criminal. The tories were so struck with these arguments, that the bill passed without farther opposition, and immediately received the royal assent. Thus the settlement was confirmed by those very people who had so loudly exclaimed against it as illegal ; but the whigs, with all their management, would not have gained their point, had not the court been interested in the dispute.

24. There was another violent contest between the two parties, on the import of a bill requiring all subjects in office to abjure king James, on pain of imprisonment. Though the clergy were at first exempted from this test, the main body of the tories opposed it with great vehemence ; while the whigs, under countenance of the ministry, supported it with equal vigor : it produced long and violent debates ; and the two factions seemed pretty equally balanced : at length, the tories represented to the king, that a great deal of precious time would be lost in fruitless altercation ; that those who declared against the bill would grow sullen and intractable, so as to oppose every other motion that might be made for the king's service ; that, in case of its being carried, his majesty must fall again into the hands of the whigs, who would renew their former practices against the prerogative ; and many individuals, who were now either well affected to him, or at least neutral, would become Jacobites from resentment. These suggestions had such weight with king William, that he sent an intimation to the commons, desiring they would drop the debate, and proceed to matters that were more pressing : the whigs in general were disgusted at this interposition ; and the earl of Shrewsbury, who interested himself warmly in behalf of the bill, resented it so deeply, that he insisted on resigning his office of secretary of state. The king, who revered his talents and integrity, employed Dr. Tillotson and others, who were supposed to have credit with the earl, to dissuade him from quitting his employment ; but he continued deaf to all their remonstrances, and would not even comply with the request of his majesty, who pressed him to keep the seals until he should return from Ireland : long debates were likewise managed in the house of lords, on the bill of abjuration, or rather an oath of special fidelity to William, in opposition to James : the tories professed themselves willing to enter into a negative engagement against the late king and his adherents ; but they opposed the oath of abjuration with all their might ; and the house was so equally divided that neither side was willing to hazard a decision ; so that all the fruit of their debates was a prolongation of the session.

25. An act was prepared for investing the queen with the administration during the king's absence ; another for reversing the judgment on a quo warranto against the city of London, and restoring it to its ancient rights and privileges ; and at length, the bill of indemnity so cordially recommended by the king passed both houses.<sup>11</sup> On the twenty-first of

May the king closed the session with a short speech, in which he thanked them for the supplies they had granted; and recommended to them a punctual discharge of their duties in their respective counties, that the peace of the nation might not be interrupted in his absence. The houses were adjourned to the seventh of July, when the parliament was prorogued and adjourned successively. As a farther security for the peace of the kingdom, the deputy-lieutenants were authorised to raise the militia in case of necessity: all papists were prohibited to stir above five miles from their respective places of abode: a proclamation was published for apprehending certain disaffected persons: Sir John Cochran and Ferguson were actually arrested on suspicion of treasonable practices. On the fourth of June the king set out for Ireland, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough, Manchester, and many other persons of distinction; on the fourteenth he landed at Carrickfergus, from whence he immediately proceeded to Belfast, where he was met by the duke of Schomberg, the prince of Wirtemberg, major-general Kirke, and other officers: by this time colonel Wolsey, at the head of 1000 men, had defeated a strong detachment of the enemy near Belturbat: Sir John Lanier had taken Bedloe-castle; and that of Charlemont, a strong post of great importance, together with Balingargy, near Cavan, had been reduced. King William, having reposed himself for two or three days at Belfast, visited the duke's headquarters at Lisburne: then, advancing to Hillsborough, published an order against pressing horses, and committing violence on the country-people. When some of his general officers proposed cautious measures, he declared he did not come to Ireland to let the grass grow under his feet: he ordered the army to encamp and be reviewed at Loughbrilland, where he found it amount to 36,000 effective men well appointed: then he marched to Dundalk; and afterwards advanced to Ardee, which the enemy had just abandoned.

26. King James trusted so much to the disputes in the English parliament, that he did not believe his son-in-law the people were encouraged to celebrate the event with bonfires and illuminations. William rode along the line to show himself to the army after this narrow escape: at night he called a council of war, and declared his resolution to attack the enemy in the morning. Schomberg at first opposed his design; but finding the king determined, he advised that a strong detachment of horse and foot should that night pass the Boyne at Slane-bridge, and take post between the enemy and the pass of Duleck, that the action might be the more decisive: this counsel being rejected, the king determined, that, early in the morning, lieutenant-general Douglas, with the right wing of infantry, and young Schomberg, with the horse, should pass at Slane-bridge, while the main body of foot should force their passage at Old-bridge, and the left at certain fords between the enemy's camp and Drogheda. The duke, perceiving his advice was not relished by the Dutch generals, retired to his tent, where the order of battle being brought to him, he received it with an air of discontent, saying it was the first that had ever been sent him in that manner. The proper dispositions being made, William rode quite through the army by torch-light, and then retired to his tent, after having given orders for the soldiers to distinguish themselves from the enemy, by wearing green boughs in their hats during the action.

28. At six o'clock in the morning, general Douglas, with young Schomberg, the earl of Portland, and Auverquerque, marched towards Slane-bridge, and passed the river with very little opposition: when they reached the farther bank, they perceived the enemy draw up in two lines, to a considerable number of horse and foot, with a morass in their front; so that Douglas was obliged to wait for a reinforcement. This being arrived, the infantry was led on to the charge through the morass, while count Schomberg rode round it with his cavalry, to attack the enemy in flank. The Irish, instead of waiting the assault, faced about, and retreated towards Duleck with some precipitation; yet not so fast, but that Schomberg fell in among their rear, and did considerable execution: king James, however, soon reinforced his left wing from the centre; and the count was in his turn obliged to send for assistance. At this juncture, king William's main body, consisting of the Dutch guards, the French regiments, and some battalions of English, passed the river, which was waist-high, under a general discharge of artillery. King James had imprudently removed his cannon from the other side ; but he had posted a strong body of musketeers along the bank, behind hedges, houses, and some works raised for the occasion : these poured in a close fire on the English troops before they reached the shore ; but it produced very little effect : then the Irish gave way, and some battalions landed without farther opposition : yet, before they could form, they were charged with great impetuosity by a squadron of the enemy's horse ; and a considerable body of their cavalry and foot, commanded by general Hamilton, advanced from behind some little hillocks to attack those that were landed, as well as to prevent the rest from reaching the shore : his infantry turned their backs and fled immediately ; but the horse charged with incredible fury, both on the bank and in the river, so as to put the unformed regiments in confusion : then the duke of Schomberg passed the river in person, put himself at the head of the French protestants, and, pointing to the enemy ;—‘ Gentlemen,’ said he, ‘ those are your persecutors : ’ with these words he advanced to the attack, where he himself sustained a violent onset from a party of the Irish horse, which had broke through one of the regiments, and were now on their return : they were mistaken for English, and allowed to gallop up to the duke, who received two severe wounds in the head ; but the French regiments being now sensible of their mistake, rashly threw in their fire on the Irish while they were engaged with the duke ; and, instead of saving, shot him dead on the spot. The fate of this general had well nigh proved fatal to the English army, which was immediately involved in tumult and disorder ; while the infantry of king James rallied, and returned to their posts with a face of resolution : they were just ready to fall on the centre, when king William, having passed with the left wing, composed of the Danish, Dutch, and Inniskillin horse, advanced to attack them on the right : they were struck with such a panic at his appearance, that they made a sudden halt, and then facing about, retreated to the village of Dunmore : there they made such a vigorous stand, that the Dutch and Danish horse, though headed by the king in person, recoiled ; even the Inniskilliners gave way ; and the whole wing would have been routed, had not a detachment of dragoons, belonging to the regiments of Cunningham and Levison, dismounted, and lined the hedges on each side of the defile through which the fugitives were driven : there they did such execution on the pursuers, as soon checked their ardor : the horse, which were broken, had now time to rally; and, returning to the charge, drove the enemy before them in their turn. In this action, general Hamilton, who had been the life and soul of the Irish during the whole engagement, was wounded and taken;—an incident, which discouraged them to such a degree, that they made no farther efforts to retrieve the advantage they had lost: he was immediately brought to the king, who asked him if he thought the Irish would make any farther resistance; and he replied, ‘On my honor, I believe they will; for they have still a good body of horse intire.’ William, eyeing him with a look of disdain, repeated, ‘Your honor! your honor!’ but took no other notice of his having acted contrary to his engagement, when he was permitted to go to Ireland, on promise of persuading Tyrconnel to submit to the new government. The Irish now abandoned the field with precipitation; but the French and Swiss troops, that acted as their auxiliaries, under Lauzun, retreated in good order, after having maintained the battle for some time with intrepidity and perseverance.

29. As king William did not think proper to pursue the enemy, the carnage was not great: the Irish lost 1500 men, and the English about one third of that number; though the victory was dearly purchased, considering the death of the gallant duke of Schomberg, who fell in the eighty-second year of his age, after having rivalled the best generals of the time in military reputation. He was descended of a noble family in the palatinate; and his mother was an English woman, daughter of lord Dudley: being obliged to leave his country on account of the troubles by which it was agitated, he commenced a soldier of fortune, and served successively in the armies of Holland, England, France, Portugal, and Brandenburg: he attained to the dignities of mareschal in France, grandee in Portugal, generalissimo in Prussia, and duke in England: he professed the protestant religion; was courteous and humble in his deportment; cool, penetrating, resolute, and sagacious; nor was his probity inferior to his courage. This battle likewise proved fatal to the brave Caillemote, who had followed the duke’s fortunes, and commanded one of the protestant regiments: after having received a mortal wound, he was carried back through the river by four soldiers; and though almost in the agonies of death, he with a cheerful countenance encouraged those who were crossing to do their duty, exclaiming, à la gloire, mes enfans; à la gloire! ‘to glory, my lads.’

to glory !' The third remarkable person who lost his life on this occasion was Walker the clergyman, who had so valiantly defended Londonderry against the whole army of king James : he had been very graciously received by king William, who gratified him with a reward of £5000, and a promise of farther favor ; but his military genius still predominating, he attended his royal patron in this battle ; and, being shot in the belly, died in a few minutes. The persons of distinction who fell on the other side were the lords Dongan and Carlingford ; Sir Neile O'Neile, and the marquis of Hocquincourt. James himself stood aloof during the action, on the hill of Dunmore, surrounded with some squadrons of horse ; and seeing victory declare against him, retired to Dublin, without having made the least effort to reassemble his broken forces : had he possessed either spirit or conduct, his army might have been rallied and reinforced from his garrisons, so as to be in a condition to keep the field, and even act on the offensive ; for his loss was inconsiderable, and the victor did not attempt to molest his troops in their retreat ; — an omission, which has been charged on him as a flagrant instance of misconduct. Indeed, through the whole of this engagement, William's personal courage was much more conspicuous than his military skill.

30. King James no sooner arrived at Dublin, than he assembled the magistrates and council of the city, and in a short speech resigned them to the fortune of the victor : he complained of the cowardice of the Irish ; signified his resolution of leaving the kingdom immediately ; forbade them, on their allegiance, to burn or plunder the city after his departure ; and assured them, that though he was obliged to yield to force, he would never cease to labor for their deliverance : next day he set out for Waterford, attended by the duke of Berwick, Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis : he ordered all the bridges to be broken down behind him, and embarked in a vessel which had been prepared for his reception. At sea he fell in with the French squadron, commanded by the sieur de Foran, who persuaded him to go on board one of his frigates, which was a prime sailer : in this he was safely conveyed to France, and returned to the place of his former residence at St. Germain. He had no sooner quitted Dublin, than it was also abandoned by all the papists : the protestants immediately took possession of the arms belonging to the militia, under the conduct of the bishops of Meath and Limerick : a committee was formed to take charge of the administration ; and an account of these transactions was transmitted to king William, together with a petition that he would honor the city with his presence.

31. On the morning after the battle of the Boyne, William sent a detachment of horse and foot, under the command of M. Mellionere, to Drogheda, the governor of which surrendered the place without opposition. The king, at the head of the army, began his march for Dublin, and halted the first night at Bally-Breghan, where, having received advice of the enemy's retreat from the capital, he sent the duke of Ormond, with a body of horse, to take possession : these were immediately followed by the Dutch guards, who secured the castle. In a few days the king encamped at Finglas, in the neighborhood of Dublin, where he was visited by the bishops of Meath and Limerick, at the head of the protestant clergy, whom he assured of his favor and protection : then he published a declaration of pardon to all the common people who had served against him, provided they should return to their dwellings, and surrender their arms by the first of August : those that rented lands of popish proprietors, who had been concerned in the rebellion, were required to retain their rents in their own hands, until they should have notice from the commissioners of the revenue to whom they should be paid : the desperate leaders of the rebellion, who had violated the laws of the kingdom, called in the French, authorised the depredations which had been committed on protestants, and rejected the pardon offered to them on the king's first proclamation, were left to the event of war, unless by evident demonstrations of repentance they should deserve mercy, which would never be refused to those who were truly penitent. The next step taken by king William was to issue a proclamation, reducing the brass money to nearly its intrinsic value : in the mean time, the principal officers in the army of James, after having seen him embark at Waterford, returned to their troops, determined to prosecute the war as long as they could be supplied with means to support their operations.

32. During these transactions, the queen, as regent, found herself surrounded with numberless cares and perplexities : her council was pretty equally divided into whigs and tories, who did not always act with unanimity : she was distracted between her apprehensions for her father's safety and her husband's life : she was threatened with an invasion by the French from abroad and with an insurrection by the Jacobites at home : nevertheless, she disguised her fears, and behaved with equal prudence and fortitude. Advice being received that a fleet was ready to sail from Brest, lord Torrington hoisted his flag in the Downs, and sailed round to St. Helens, in order to assemble such a number of ships as would enable him to give them battle : the enemy being discovered off Plymouth on the twentieth of June, the English admiral, reinforced with a Dutch squadron, stood out to sea, with a view to intercept them at the back of the isle of Wight, should they presume to sail up the channel ; not that he thought himself strong enough to cope with them in battle : their fleet consisted of seventy-eight ships of war, and two-and-twenty fireships ; whereas, the combined squadrons of England and Holland did not exceed six-and-fifty ; but he had received orders to hazard an engagement, if he thought it might be done with any prospect of success. After the hostile fleets had continued five days in sight of each other, lord Torrington bore down on the enemy off Beachy-head, on the thirtieth of June, at day-break. The Dutch squadron which composed the van began the engagement about nine in the morning ; in about half an hour the blue division of the English were close engaged with the rear of the French ; but the red, which formed the centre, under the command of Torrington in person, did not fill the line till ten o'clock ; so that the Dutch were almost surrounded by the enemy, and though they fought with great valor, sustained considerable damage : at length, the admiral's division drove between them and the French, and in that situation the fleet anchored about five in the afternoon, when the action was interrupted by a calm. The Dutch had suffered so severely, that Torrington thought it would be imprudent to renew the battle ; he, therefore, weighed anchor in the night, and with the tide of flood retired to the eastward : the next day the disabled ships were destroyed, that they might not be retarded in their retreat : they were pursued as far as Rye ; an English ship of seventy guns being stranded near Winchelsea, was set on fire, and deserted by the captain's command : a Dutch ship of sixty-four guns met with the same accident, and some French frigates attempted to burn her ; but the captain defended her so vigorously, that they were obliged to desist, and he afterwards found means to carry her safe to Holland. In this engagement the English lost two ships, two sea-captains, and about 400 men; but the Dutch were more unfortunate: six of their great ships were destroyed: Dick and Brackel, rear-admirals, were slain, together with a great number of inferior officers and seamen. Torrington retreated without farther interruption into the mouth of the Thames; and, having taken precautions against any attempts of the enemy in that quarter, returned to London, the inhabitants of which were overwhelmed with consternation.

33. The government was infected with the same panic: the ministry pretended to believe that the French acted in concert with the malcontents of the nation; that insurrections in the different parts of the kingdom had been projected by the Jacobites; and that there would be a general revolt in Scotland: these insinuations were circulated by the court-agents, in order to justify, in the opinion of the public, the measures that were deemed necessary at this juncture; and they produced the desired effect. The apprehensions thus artfully raised among the people inflamed their aversion to nonjurors and Jacobites: addresses were presented to the queen by the Cornish tinnerns, by the lieutenancy of Middlesex, and by the mayor, aldermen, and lieutenancy of London, filled with professions of loyalty, and promises of supporting their majesties, as their lawful sovereigns, against all opposition. The queen, at this crisis, exhibited remarkable proofs of courage, activity, and discretion: she issued out proper orders and directions for putting the nation in a posture of defence, as well as for refitting and augmenting the fleet: she took measures for appeasing the resentment of the States-General, who exclaimed against the earl of Torrington for his behavior in the late action: he was deprived of his command, and sent prisoner to the Tower; and commissioners were appointed to examine the particular circumstances of his conduct: a camp was formed in the neighborhood of Torbay, where the French seemed to threaten a descent: their fleet, which lay at anchor in the bay, cannonaded a small village called Teignmouth: about 1000 of their men landed without opposition, set fire to the place, and burned a few coasting vessels; then they re-embarked, and returned to Brest, so vain of this achievement, that they printed a pompous account of their invasion. Some of the whig partisans published pamphlets, and diffused reports, implying that the suspended bishops were concerned in the conspiracy against the government; and these arts proved so inflammatory among the common people, that the prelates thought it necessary to print a paper, in which they asserted their innocence in the most solemn protestations: the court seems to have harbored no suspicion against them, otherwise they would not have escaped imprisonment. The queen issued a proclamation for apprehending the earls of Lichfield, Aylesbury, and Castlemaine; viscount Preston; the lords Montgomery and Bellasis; Sir Edward Hales, Sir Robert Tharold, Sir Robert Hamilton, Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, colonel Edward Sackville, and some other officers: these were accused of having conspired with other disaffected persons to disturb and destroy the government, and of a design to concur with her majesty's enemies in the intended invasion. The earl of Torrington continued a prisoner in the Tower till next session, when he was brought into the house of commons, and made a speech in his own defence: his case produced long debates in the upper house, where the form of his commitment was judged illegal: at length, he was tried by a court-martial appointed by the commissioners of the Admiralty, though not before an act had passed, declaring the power of a lord high-admiral vested in those commissioners: the president of the court was Sir Ralph Delaval, who had acted as vice-admiral of the blue in the engagement. The earl was acquitted, but the king dismissed him from the service; and the Dutch exclaimed against the partiality of his judges.

34. William is said to have intercepted all the papers of his father-in-law and Tyrconnel; and to have learned from them, not only the design projected by the French to burn the English transports, but likewise the undertaking of one Jones, who engaged to assassinate king William: no such attempt, however, was made; and, in all probability, the whole report was a fiction, calculated to throw an odium on James's character. On the ninth of July, William detached general Douglas with a considerable body of horse and foot towards Athlone, while he himself, having left Trelawny to command at Dublin, advanced with the rest of his army to Inchiquin, in his way to Kilkenny. Colonel Grace, the governor of Athlone for king James, being summoned to surrender, fired a pistol at the trumpeter, saying, 'These are my terms:' then Douglas resolved to undertake the siege of the place, which was naturally very strong, and defended by a resolute garrison. An inconsiderable breach was made; when Douglas, receiving intelligence that Sarsfield was on his march to the relief of the besieged, abandoned the enterprise, after having lost above 400 men in the attempt. The king continued his march to the westward; and, by dint of severe examples, established such order and discipline in his army, that the peasants were secure from the least violence: at Carlow, he detached the duke of Ormond to take possession of Kilkenny, where that nobleman regaled him in his own castle, which the enemy had left undamaged. While the army encamped at Carrick, major-general Kirke was sent to Waterford, the garrison of which, consisting of two regiments, capitulated, on condition of marching out with their arms and baggage, and being conducted to Mallow: the fort of Duncannon was surrendered on the same terms: here the lord Dover and the lord George Howard were admitted to the benefit of the king's mercy and protection.

35. On the first of August, William being at Chapel-Izard, published a second declaration of mercy, confirming the former, and even extending it to persons of superior rank and station, whether natives or foreigners, provided they would, by the twenty-fifth of the month, lay down their arms, and submit to certain conditions: this offer of indemnity produced very little effect; for the Irish were generally governed by their priests, and the news of the victory which the French fleet had obtained over the English and Dutch was circulated with such exaggerations, as elevated their spirits, and effaced all thoughts of submission. The king had returned to Dublin, with a view to embark for England; but receiving notice that the designs of his domestic enemies were discovered and frustrated, that the fleet was repaired, and the French navy retired to Brest, he postponed his voyage, and resolved to reduce Limerick, in which Monsieur Boisseleau commanded as governor, and the duke of Berwick and colonel Sarsfield acted as inferior officers: on the ninth of August, the king having called in his detachment, and advanced into the neighborhood of the place, summoned the commander to deliver the town; and Boisseleau answered, that he imagined the best way to gain the good opinion of the prince of Orange would be a vigorous defence of the town which his majesty had committed to his charge. Before the place was fully invested, colonel Sarsfield, with a body of horse and dragoons, passed the Shannon in the night, intercepted the king's train of artillery on its way to the camp, routed the troops that guarded it, disabled the cannon, destroyed the carriages, waggon, and ammudition, and returned in safety to Limerick. Notwithstanding this disaster, the trenches were opened on the seventeenth of the month, and a battery was raised with some cannon brought from Waterford: the siege was carried on with vigor, and the place defended with great resolution: at length, the king ordered his troops to make a lodgement in the covered way, or counterscarp, which was accordingly assaulted with great fury; but the assailants met with such a warm reception from the besieged, that they were repulsed with the loss of 1200 men, either killed on the spot or mortally wounded: this disappointment, concurring with the badness of the weather, which became rainy and unwholesome, induced the king to renounce his undertaking: the heavy baggage and cannon being sent away, the army decamped, and marched towards Clonmel. William, having constituted lord Sidney and Thomas Coningsby lords justices of Ireland, and left the command of the army with count Solmes, embarked at Duncannon with prince George of Denmark, on the fifth of September, and next day arrived in King-road, near Bristol, from whence he repaired to Windsor.

36. About the latter end of this month the earl of Marlborough arrived in Ireland, with 5000 English troops to attack Cork and Kinsale, in conjunction with a detachment from the great army, according to a scheme he had proposed to king William: having landed his soldiers without much opposition in the neighborhood of Cork, he was joined by 5000 men, under the prince of Wirtemberg, between whom and the earl a dispute arose about the command; but this was compromised by the interposition of La Mellionere. The place being invested, and the batteries raised, the besiegers proceeded with such rapidity, that a breach was soon effected: colonel Mackillicut, the governor, demanded a parley, and hostages were exchanged; but he rejected the conditions that were offered, and hostilities recommenced with redoubled vigor: the duke of Grafton, who served on this occasion as a volunteer, was mortally wounded in one of the attacks, and died regretted as a youth of promising talents. Preparations being made for a general assault, the besieged thought proper to capitulate, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war: besides the governor and colonel Ricaut, the victor found the earls of Clancarte and Tyrone among the individuals of the garrison. Marlborough, having taken possession of Cork, detached brigadier Villiers with a body of horse and dragoons to summon the town and forts of Kinsale, and next day advanced with the rest of the forces: the old fort was immediately taken by assault; but Sir Edward Scott, who commanded the other, sustained a regular siege, until the breach was practicable, and then obtained an honorable capitulation. These maritime places being reduced, all communication between France and the enemy, on this side of the island, was cut off, and the Irish were confined to Ulster, where they could not subsist without great difficulty. The earl of Marlborough having finished this expedition in thirty days, returned with his prisoners to England, where the fame of this exploit added greatly to his reputation.

37. During these transactions, count de Lauzun, commander of the French auxiliaries in Ireland, lay inactive in the neighborhood of Galway, and transmitted such a lamentable account of his situation to the court of France, that transports were sent over to bring home the French forces: in these he embarked with his troops, and the command of the Irish forces devolved to the duke of Berwick, though it was afterwards transferred to M. St. Ruth: Lauzun was disgraced at Versailles for having deserted the cause before it was desperate: Tyrconnel, who accompanied him in his voyage, solicited the French court for a farther supply of officers, arms, clothes, and ammunition for the Irish army, which he said would continue firm to the interest of king James, if thus supported: meanwhile they formed themselves into separate bodies of freebooters, and plundered the country, under the appellation of Rapparees; while the troops of king William either enjoyed their ease in quarters, or imitated the rapine of the enemy; so that, between both, the poor people were miserably harassed.

38. The affairs of the continent had not yet undergone any change of importance, except in the conduct of the duke of Savoy, who renounced his neutrality; engaged in an alliance with the emperor and king of Spain; and, in a word, acceded to the grand confederacy: he had no sooner declared himself, than Catinat, the French general, entered his territories at the head of 18,000 men, and defeated him in a pitched battle near Saluces, which immediately surrendered to the conqueror: then he reduced Savillana, Villa Franca, with several other places; pursued the duke to Carignan; surprised Suza; and distributed his forces in winter-quarters, partly in Provence, and partly in the duchy of Savoy, which St. Ruth had lately reduced under the dominion of France. The duke, finding himself disappointed in the succors he expected from the emperor and the king of Spain, demanded assistance of the States-General and king William: to this last he sent an ambassador, to congratulate him on his accession to the throne of England. The confederates, in their general congress at the Hague, had agreed that the army of the States under prince Waldeck should oppose the forces of France, commanded by the duke of Luxemburg in Flanders; while the elector of Brandenburg should observe the marquis de Boufflers on the Moselle; but, before the troops of Brandenburg could be assembled, Boufflers encamped between the Sambre and the Meuse, and maintained a free communication with Luxemburg.

39. Prince Waldeck, understanding that this general intended to cross the Sambre between Namur and Charleroy, in order to lay the Spanish territories under contribution, decamped from the river Pieton, and detached the count of Berlo, with a great body of horse, to observe the motions of the enemy: he was encountered by the French army near Fleurus, and slain; and his troops, though supported by two other detachments, were hardly able to rejoin the main body, which continued all night in order of battle: next day they were attacked by the French, who were greatly superior to them in number: after a very obstinate engagement the allies gave way, leaving about 5000 men dead on the field of battle: the enemy took about 4000 prisoners, and the greatest part of their artillery; but the victory was dearly bought. The Dutch infantry fought with surprising resolution and success: the duke of Luxemburg owned with surprise that they had surpassed the Spanish foot at the battle of Rocroy: 'Prince Waldeck,' said he, 'ought always to remember the French horse; and I shall never forget the Dutch infantry.' The Dutch general exerted himself with such activity, that the French derived very little advantage from their victory: the prince being reinforced with the five English regiments, 9000 Hanoverians, 10,000 from the bishopric of Liege and Holland, joined the elector of Brandenburg, so that the confederate army amounted to 55,000 men, and they marched by the way of Genap to Bois-Seigneur-Isaac: they were now superior to Luxemburg, who thought proper to fortify his camp, that he might not be obliged to fight, except with considerable advantage: nevertheless, prince Waldeck would have attacked him in his intrenchments, had he not been prohibited from hazarding another engagement by an express order of the States-General; and, when this restriction was removed, the elector would not venture a battle.

40. By this time the emperor's son Joseph was by the electoral college chosen king of the Romans; but his interest sustained a rude shock in the death of the gallant duke of Lorraine, who was suddenly seized with a quinsy at a small village near Lintz, and expired, not without suspicion of having fallen a sacrifice to the fears of the French king, against whom he had formally declared war as a sovereign prince unjustly expelled from his territories: he possessed great military talents, and had threatened to enter Lorraine, at the head of 40,000 men, in the course of the ensuing summer: the court of France, alarmed at this declaration, is said to have had recourse to poison for preventing the execution of the duke's design. At his death, the command of the imperial army was conferred on the elector of Bavaria: this prince, having joined the elector of Saxony, advanced against the Dauphin, who had passed the Rhine at Fort-Louis with a considerable army, and intended to penetrate into Wirtemberg; but the duke of Bavaria checked his progress, and he acted on the defensive during the remaining part of the campaign. The emperor was less fortunate in his efforts against the Turks, who rejected the conditions of peace he had offered, and took the field under a new visir: in the month of August, count Tekeli defeated a body of imperialists near Cronstadt, in Transylvania; then, convoking the states of that province at Albajulia, he compelled them to elect him their sovereign; but his reign was of short duration. Prince Louis of Baden, having taken the command of the Austrian army, detached four regiments into Belgrade, and advanced against Tekeli, who retired into Walachia, at his approach: meanwhile the grand visir invested Belgrade, and carried on his attacks with surprising resolution: at length, a bomb falling on a great tower, in which the powder-magazine of the besieged was contained, the place blew up with a dreadful explosion: 1700 soldiers of the garrison were destroyed; the walls and ramparts were overthrown; the ditch was filled up; and so large a breach was opened, that the Turks entered by squadrons and battalions, cutting in pieces all that fell in their way: the fire spread from magazine to magazine, until eleven were destroyed; and, in the confusion, the remaining part of the garrison escaped to Peterwaradin. By this time the imperialists were in possession of Transylvania, and cantoned at Cronstadt and Clausenburg: Tekeli undertook to attack the province on one side, while a body of Turks should invade it on the other: these last were totally dispersed by prince Louis of Baden; but prince Augustus of Hanover, whom he had detached against the count, was slain in a narrow defile, and his troops were obliged to retreat with precipitation: Tekeli, however, did not improve this advantage: being apprised of the fate of his allies, and afraid of seeing his retreat cut off by the snow that frequently chokes up the passes of the mountains, he retreated again to Walachia, and prince Louis returned to Vienna.

41. King William having published a proclamation, requiring the attendance of the members on the second of October, both houses met accordingly, and he opened the session with a speech to the usual purport. He mentioned what he had done towards the reduction of Ireland; commended the behavior of the troops; told them the supplies were not equal to the necessary expense; represented the danger to which the nation would be exposed unless the war should be prosecuted with vigor; conjured them to clear his revenue, which was mortgaged for the payment of former debts, and enable him to pay off the arrears of the army; assured them that the success of the confederacy abroad would depend on the vigor and despatch of their proceedings; expressed his resentment against those who had been guilty of misconduct in the management of the fleet; recommended unanimity and expedition; and declared, that whoever should attempt to divert their attention from those subjects of importance which he had proposed, could neither be a friend to him nor a well-wisher to his country. The late attempt of the French on the coast of England; the rumors of a conspiracy by the Jacobites; the personal valor which William had displayed in Ireland, and the pusillanimous behavior of James, concurred in warming the resentment of the nation against the adherents of the late king, and in raising a tide of loyalty in favor of the new government: both houses presented separate addresses of congratulation to the king and queen, on his courage and conduct in the field, and her fortitude and sagacity at the helm, in times of danger and disquiet: the commons, pursuant to an estimate laid before them of the next year's expenses, voted a supply of £4,000,000 for the maintenance of the army and navy, and settled the funds for that purpose.

42. They proposed to raise £1,000,000 by the sale of forfeited estates in Ireland: they resolved that a bill should be brought in for confiscating those estates, with a clause, empowering the king to bestow a third part of them on those who had served in the war, as well as to grant such articles and capitulations to those who were in arms as he should think proper: this clause was rejected; and a great number of petitions were offered against the bill by creditors and heirs, who had continued faithful to the government: these were supposed to have been suggested by the court, in order to retard the progress of the bill; for the estates had been already promised to the king's favorites: nevertheless, the bill passed the lower house, and was sent up to the lords, among whom it was purposely delayed by the influence of the ministry: it was at this juncture that lord Torrington was tried and acquitted, very much to the dissatisfaction of the king, who not only dismissed him from the service, but even forbade him to appear in his presence. When William came to the house of lords, to give the royal assent to a bill for doubling the excise, he told the parliament, that the posture of affairs required his presence at the Hague; that, therefore, they ought to lose no time in perfecting such other supplies as were still necessary for the maintenance of the army and navy; and he reminded them of making some provision for the expense of the civil government. Two bills were accordingly passed for granting to their majesties the duties on goods imported for five years; and these, together with the mutiny-bill, received the royal assent; on which occasion the king observed, that if some annual provision be made for augmenting the navy, it would greatly conduce to the honor and safety of the nation. In consequence of this hint, they voted a considerable supply for building additional ships of war,<sup>12</sup> and proceeded with such alacrity

<sup>12</sup> This supply was raised by the additional duties on beer, ale, and other liquors: they also provided in the bill, that the impositions on wines, vinegar, and tobacco should be made a fund of credit; that the surplus of the grants they had made, after the current service was provided for, should be applicable to the payment of the debts contracted by the war; and that it should be lawful for their majesties to make use of £500,000 out of the said grants, on condition of that sum being repaid from the revenue.—

and expedition as even seemed to anticipate the king's desires. This liberality and despatch were in a great measure owing to the management of lord Godolphin, who was now placed at the head of the treasury; and Sir John Somers, the solicitor-general: the place of the secretary of state, which had remained vacant since the resignation of the earl of Shrewsbury, was now filled with Lord Sidney; and Sir Charles Porter was appointed one of the justices of Ireland, in the room of this nobleman.

43. Notwithstanding the act for reversing the proceedings against the city-charter, the whigs had made shift to keep possession of the magistracy: Pilkington continued mayor, and Robinson retained the office of chamberlain. The tories of the city, presuming on their late services, presented a petition to the house of commons, complaining that the intent of the late act of parliament, for reversing the judgment on the quo warranto was frustrated by some doubtful expression; so that the old aldermen elected by commission under the late king's great seal still acted by virtue of that authority: that Sir Thomas Pilkington was not duly returned as mayor by the common-hall; and that he and the aldermen had imposed Mr. Leonard Robinson on them as chamberlain, though another person was duly elected into that office: that divers members of the common-council were illegally excluded, and others duly elected were refused admittance. They specified other grievances, and petitioned for relief. Pilkington and his associates undertook to prove that those allegations were either false or frivolous; and represented the petition as a contrivance of the Jacobites to disturb the peace of the city, that the supply might be retarded, and the government distressed. In the late panic which overspread the nation, the whigs had appeared to be the moneyed men, and subscribed largely for the security of the settlement they had made; while the tories kept aloof with a suspicious caution: for this reason the court now interposed its influence in such a manner, that little or no regard was paid to their remonstrance.

44. The marquis of Carmarthen, lord president, who was at the head of the tory interest in the ministry, and had acquired great credit with the king and queen, now fell under the displeasure of the opposite faction; and they resolved, if possible, to revive his old impeachment: the earl of Shrewsbury and thirteen other leading men had engaged in this design: a committee of lords was appointed to examine precedents, and inquire whether impeachments continued in statu quo from parliament to parliament: several such precedents were reported, and violent debates ensued; but the marquis eluded the vengeance of his enemies, in consequence of the following question:—‘whether the earls of Salisbury and Peterborough, who had been impeached in the former parliament for being reconciled to the church of Rome, shall be discharged from their bail?’ The house resolved in the affirmative, and several lords entered a protest. The commons having finished a bill for appointing commissioners to take and state the public accounts, and having chosen the commissioners from among their own members, sent it up to the house of lords: there the earl of Rochester moved that they should add some of their number to those of the commons: they accordingly chose an equal number by ballot; but Rochester himself being elected, refused to act: the others followed his example; and the bill passed without alteration. On the fifth of January, the king put an end to the session with a speech, in which he thanked them for the repeated instances they had exhibited of their affection to his person and government: he told them it was high time for him to embark for Holland; recommended unanimity; and assured them of his particular favor and protection: then lord chief baron Atkins signified his majesty’s pleasure that the two houses should adjourn themselves to the thirty-first of March.<sup>13</sup>

45. William, having settled the affairs of the nation, set out for Margate, Jan. 6, 1691; but the ship in which he proposed to embark being detained by an easterly wind and hard frost, he returned to Kensington: on the sixteenth, however, he embarked at Gravesend with a numerous retinue, and set sail for Holland, under convoy of twelve ships of war, commanded by admiral Rooke: next day, being informed by a fisherman that he was within a league and a half of Goree, he quitted the yacht, and went into an open boat, attended by the duke of Ormond, the earls of Devonshire, Dorset, Portland, and Monmouth, with Auverquerque and Zuylestein. Instead of landing immediately, they lost sight of the fleet; and, night coming on, were exposed in very severe weather to the danger of the enemy and the sea, which ran very high for eighteen hours, during which the king and all his attendants were drenched with sea-water. When the sailors expressed their apprehensions of perishing, the king asked if they were afraid to die in his company. At day-break he landed on the isle of Goree, where he took some refreshment in a fisherman's hut: then he committed himself to the boat again, and was conveyed to the shore in the neighborhood of Measlandsluys: a deputation of the States received him at Hounslardyke: about six in the evening he arrived at the Hague, where he was immediately complimented by the States-General, the states of Holland, the council of state, the other colleges, and the foreign ministers: he afterwards, at the request of the magistrates, made his public entry with surprising magnificence; and the Dutch celebrated his arrival with bonfires, illuminations, and other marks of tumultuous joy: he assisted at their different assemblies; informed them of his successes in England and Ireland; and assured them of his constant zeal and affection for his native country.

46. At a solemn congress of the confederate princes, he represented, in a set speech, the dangers to which they were exposed from the power and ambition of France, and the necessity of acting with vigor and despatch: he declared he would spare neither his credit, forces, nor person in concurring with their measures; and that in the spring he would come at the head of his troops to fulfil his engagements. They forthwith resolved to employ 222,000 men against France in the ensuing campaign: the proportions of the different princes and states were regulated; and the king of England agreed to furnish 20,000: he supplied the duke of Savoy so liberally, that his affairs soon assumed a more promising aspect. The plan of operations was settled; and they transacted their affairs with such harmony, that no dispute interrupted their deliberations. In the beginning of March, immediately after the congress broke up, the siege of Mons was undertaken by the French king in person, accompanied by the dauphin, the dukes of Orleans and Chartres: the garrison consisted of about 6000 men, commanded by the prince of Berg; but the besiegers carried on their works with such rapidity as they could not withstand. King William no sooner understood that the place was invested, than he ordered prince Waldeck to assemble the army, determined to march against the enemy in person : 50,000 men were soon collected at Halle, near Brussels ; but when he went thither, he found the Spaniards had neglected to provide carriages and other necessaries for the expedition : meanwhile, the burghers of Mons, seeing their town in danger of being utterly destroyed by the bombs and cannon of the enemy, pressed the governor to capitulate, and even threatened to introduce the besiegers : so that he was forced to comply, and obtained very honorable conditions. William, being apprised of this event, returned to the Hague, embarked for England, and arrived at Whitehall on the thirteenth of April.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>14</sup> A few days before his arrival, great part of the palace of Whitehall was consumed by fire through the negligence of a female servant. •

1. A CONSPIRACY against the government had been lately discovered: in the latter end of December, the master of a vessel who lived at Barking, in Essex, informed the marquis of Carmarthen, that his wife had let out one of his boats to carry over some persons to France; and that they would embark on the thirteenth of the month: this intelligence being communicated to the king and council, an order was sent to captain Billop, to watch the motion of the vessel, and secure the passengers: he accordingly boarded her at

Gravesend, and found in the hold lord Preston, Mr. Ashton, a servant of the late queen, and one Elliot: he likewise seized a bundle of papers, some of which were scarce intelligible; among the rest, two letters, supposed to be written by Turner, bishop of Ely, to king James and his queen, under fictitious names: the whole amounted to an invitation to the French king to assist king James in re-ascending the throne, on certain conditions, while William should be absent from the kingdom; but the scheme was ill laid, and countenanced but by a very few persons of consideration, among whom the chiefs were the earl of Clarendon, the bishop of Ely, lord Preston, his brother, Mr. Graham, and Penn, the famous quaker. Notwithstanding the outcries which had been made against the severities of the late government, Preston and his accomplice Ashton were tried at the Old Bailey for compassing the death of their majesties king William and queen Mary; and their trials were hurried on without any regard to their petitions for delay. Lord Preston alleged, in his defence, that the treasons charged on him were not committed in the county of Middlesex, as laid in the indictment; that none of the witnesses declared he had any concern in hiring the vessel; that the papers were not found on him; that there ought to be two credible witnesses to every fact, whereas the whole proof against him rested on similitude of hands, and mere supposition: he was, nevertheless, found guilty. Ashton behaved with great intrepidity and composure: he owned his purpose of going to France, in pursuance of a promise he had made to general Worden, who, on his death-bed, conjured him to go thither, and finish some affairs of consequence which he had left there depending; as well as with a view to recover a considerable sum of money due to himself: he denied that he was privy to the contents of the papers found on him: he complained of his having been denied time to prepare for his trial; and called several persons to prove him a protestant of exemplary piety and irreproachable morals. These circumstances had no weight with the court: he was brow-beaten by the bench, and found guilty by the jury, as he had the papers in his custody: yet there was no privy proved; and the whig party themselves had often expressly declared, that of all sorts of evidence, that of finding papers in a person's possession is the weakest, because no man can secure himself from such danger. Ashton suffered with equal courage and decorum: in a paper which he delivered to the sheriff, he owned his attachment to king James; he witnessed to the birth of the prince of Wales; denied his knowledge of the contents of the papers that were committed to his charge; complained of the hard measure he had met with from the judges and the jury, but forgave them in the sight of Heaven.<sup>15</sup> This man was celebrated by the nonjurors as a martyr to loyalty; and they boldly affirmed, that his chief crime in the eyes of the government was his having among his baggage an account of such evidence as would have been convincing to all the world concerning the birth of the prince of Wales, which by a great number of people was believed supposititious.<sup>16</sup> Lord Preston obtained a pardon: Elliot was not tried, because no evidence appeared against him: the earl of Clarendon was sent to the Tower, where he remained some months, and he was afterwards confined to his own house in the country; an indulgence which he owed to his consanguinity with the queen, who was his first cousin: the bishop of Ely, Graham, and Penn absconded; and a proclamation was issued for apprehending them as traitors.

2. This prelate's being concerned in a conspiracy furnished the king with a plausible pretence for filling up the vacant bishoprics. The deprived bishops had been given to understand, that an act of parliament might be obtained to excuse them from taking the oaths, provided they would perform their episcopal functions; but as they declined this expedient, the king resolved to fill up their places at his return from Holland: accordingly, the archbishopric of Canterbury was conferred on Dr. Tillotson, one of the most learned, moderate, and virtuous ecclesiastics of the age, who did not accept of this promotion without great reluctance, because he foresaw that he should be exposed to the slander and malevolence of that party which espoused the cause of his predecessor : the other vacant sees were given to divines of unblemished character ; <sup>17</sup> and the public in general seemed very well satisfied with this exertion of the king's supremacy. The deprived bishops at first affected all the meekness of resignation : they remembered those shouts of popular approbation, by which they had been animated in the persecution they suffered under the late government, and they hoped the same cordial would support them in their present affliction ; but, finding the nation cold in their concern, they determined to warm it by argument and declamation : the press groaned with the efforts of their learning and resentment ; and every essay was answered by their opponents. The nonjurors affirmed, that Christianity was a doctrine of the cross ; that no pretence whatever could justify an insurrection against the sovereign ; that the primitive Christians thought it their indispensable duty to be passive under every invasion of their rights ; and that non-resistance was the doctrine of the English church, confirmed by all the sanctions that could be derived from the laws of God and man. The other party not only supported the natural rights of mankind, and explained the use that might be made of the doctrine of non-resistance in exciting fresh commotions, but they also argued, that if passive obedience was right in any instance, it was conclusively so with regard to the present government ; for the obedience required by Scripture was indiscriminate,—‘the powers that be are ordained of God :’—‘let every soul be subject to the higher powers :’ from these texts they inferred, that the new oaths ought to be taken without scruple, and that those who refused them concealed party under the cloak of conscience. On the other hand, the fallacy and treachery of this argument were demonstrated : they said, it levelled all distinctions of justice and duty ; that those who taught such doctrines attached themselves solely to possession, however unjustly acquired ; that, if twenty different usurpers should succeed one another, they would recognise the last notwithstanding the allegiance they had so solemnly sworn to his predecessor, like the fawning spaniel that followed the thief who mounted his master's horse, after having murdered the right owner : they also denied the justice of a lay-deprivation, and with respect to church-government started the same distinctions de jure and de facto, which they had formerly made in the civil administration : they had even recourse to all the bitterness of invective against Tillotson and the new bishops, whom they reviled as intruders and usurpers : their acrimony was chiefly directed against Dr. Sherlock, who had been one of the most violent sticklers against the revolution, but thought proper to take the oaths on the retreat of king James from Ireland : they branded him as an apostate, who had betrayed his cause ; and published a review of his whole conduct, which proved a severe satire on his character : their attacks on individuals were mingled with their vengeance against the government ; and indeed the great aim of their divines, as well as of their politicians, was to sap the foundation of the new settlement : in order to alienate the minds of the people from the interest of the reigning prince, they ridiculed his character ; inveighed against his measures ; they accused him of sacrificing the concerns of England to the advantage of his native country ; and drew invidious comparisons between the wealth, the trade, the taxes of the last and of the present reign. To frustrate these efforts of the malcontents, the court employed their engines to answer and recriminate : all sorts of informers were encouraged and caressed : in a proclamation issued against papists and other disaffected persons, all magistrates were enjoined to make search and apprehend those who should, by seditious discourses and libels, presume to defame the government. Thus the revolutioners commenced the professed enemies of those very arts and practices which had enabled them to bring their scheme to perfection.

<sup>16</sup> To one of the pamphlets published on this occasion, is annexed a petition to the present government, in the name of king James's adherents, importing, that some grave and learned persons should be authorised to compile a treatise, showing the grounds of William's title; and declaring, that in case the performance should carry conviction along with it, they would submit to that title, as they had hitherto opposed it from a principle of conscience. The best answer that could be made to this summons was Locke's book on Government, which appeared at this period. —Ralph.

3. The presbyterians in Scotland acted with such folly, violence, and tyranny, as rendered them equally odious and contemptible : the transactions in their general assembly were carried on with such peevishness, partiality, and injustice, that the king dissolved it by an act of state, and convoked another for the month of November in the following year. The episcopal party promised to enter heartily into the interests of the new government, to keep the highlanders quiet, and induce the clergy to acknowledge and serve king William, provided he would balance the power of Melvil and his partisans in such a manner, as would secure them from violence and oppression ; provided the episcopal ministers should be permitted to perform their functions among those people by whom they were beloved ;

and that such of them as were willing to mix with the presbyterians in their judicatories should be admitted without any severe imposition in point of opinion. The king, who was extremely disgusted at the presbyterians, relished the proposal; and young Dalrymple, son of lord Stair, was appointed joint secretary of state with Melvil: he undertook to bring over the majority of the Jacobites, and a great number of them took the oaths; but at the same time they maintained a correspondence with the court of St. Germain, by the connivance of which they submitted to William, that they might be in a condition to serve James the more effectually. The Scottish parliament was adjourned by proclamation to the sixteenth of September: precautions were taken to prevent any dangerous communication with the continent; a committee was appointed to put the kingdom in a posture of defence; to exercise the powers of the regency in securing the enemies of the government; and the earl of Home, with Sir Peter Fraser and Sir Æneas Macpherson, were apprehended and imprisoned.

4. The king, having settled the operations of the ensuing campaign in Ireland, where general Ginckel exercised the supreme command, manned his fleet by dint of pressing sailors, to the incredible annoyance of commerce; then, leaving the queen as before at the helm of government in England, he returned to Holland, accompanied by lord Sidney, secretary of state, the earls of Marlborough and Portland, and began to make preparations for taking the field in person. On the thirtieth of May, the duke of Luxemburg having passed the Scheldt at the head of a large army, took possession of Halle, and gave it up to plunder, in sight of the confederates, who were obliged to throw up intrenchments for their preservation: at the same time, the marquis de Boufflers, with a considerable body of forces, intrenched himself before Liege, with a view to bombard that city. In the beginning of June, king William took on himself the command of the allied army, by this time reinforced in such a manner as to be superior to the enemy: he forthwith detached the count de Tilly, with 10,000 men, to the relief of Liege, which was already reduced to ruins and desolation by the bombs, bullets, and repeated attacks of Boufflers, who now thought proper to retreat to Dinant. Tilly, having thus raised the siege, and thrown a body of troops into Huy, rejoined the confederate army, which had been augmented ever since his departure with 6000 men from Brandenburg, and 10,000 Hessians, commanded by the landgrave in person. Such was the vigilance of Luxemburg, that William could not avail himself of his superiority: in vain he exhausted his invention in marches, countermarches, and stratagems, to bring on a general engagement: the French marshal avoided it with such dexterity, as baffled all his endeavors. In the course of this campaign, the two armies twice confronted each other; but they were situated in such a manner, that neither could begin the attack without a manifest disadvantage. While the king lay encamped at Court-sur-heure, a soldier, corrupted by the enemy, set fire to the fusees of several bombs, the explosion of which might have blown up the whole magazine, and produced infinite confusion in the army, had not the mischief been prevented by the courage of the men who guarded the artillery: even while the fusees were burning, they disengaged the waggons from the line, and overturned them down the side of a hill; so that the communication of the fire was intercepted. The person who made this treacherous attempt being discovered, owned he had been employed for this purpose by the duke of Luxemburg: he was tried by a court-martial, and suffered the death of a traitor. Such perfidious practices not only fix an indelible share of infamy on the French general, but prove how much the capacity of William was dreaded by his enemies. King William, quitting Court-sur-heure, encamped on the plain of St. Girard, where he remained till the fourth of September, consuming the forage, and exhausting the country: then he passed the Sambre near Jemappe, while the French crossed it at La Busiere, and both armies marched towards Enghien: the enemy, perceiving the confederates were at their heels, proceeded to Grammont, passed the Dender, and took possession of a strong camp between Ath and Oudenarde: William followed the same route, and encamped between Ath and Leuse. While he continued in his post, the Hessian forces and those of Liege, amounting to about 18,000 men, separated from the army, and passed the Meuse at Namur: then the king returned to the Hague, leaving the command to prince Waldeck, who forthwith removed to Leuse, and on the twentieth of the month began his march to Cambron. Luxemburg, who watched his motion with a curious eye, found means to attack him in his retreat so suddenly, that his rear was surprised and defeated, though the French were at last obliged to retire; the prince continued his route to Cambron, and in a little time both armies retired into winter-quarters: in the mean time, the duke de Noailles besieged and took Urgel in Catalonia; while a French squadron, commanded by the count D'Etrées, bombarded Barcelona and Alicant.

5. The confederates had proposed to act vigorously in Italy against the French; but the season was far advanced before they were in a condition to take the field: the emperor and Spain had undertaken to furnish troops to join the duke of Savoy; and the maritime powers contributed their proportion in money: the elector of Bavaria was nominated to the supreme command of the imperial forces in that country; the marquis de Leganez, governor of the Milanese, acted as trustee for the Spanish monarch: duke Schomberg, son of that great general who lost his life at the Boyne, lately created duke of Leinster, managed the interest of William, as king of England and stadtholder, and commanded a body of the Vaudois paid by Great Britain. Before the German auxiliaries arrived, the French had made great progress in their conquests: Catinat besieged and took Villa-Franca, Nice, and some other fortifications; then he reduced Villana and Carmagnola, and detached the marquis de Feuquieres to invest Coni, a strong fortress garrisoned by the Vaudois and French refugees. The duke of Savoy was now reduced to the brink of ruin: he saw almost all his places of strength in the possession of the enemy: Coni was besieged; and La Hogue, another French general, had forced the passes of the valley of Aoste; so that he had free admission into the Verceillois, and the frontiers of the Milanese: Turin was threatened with a bombardment; the people were dispirited and clamorous; and their sovereign lay with his little army encamped on the hill of Montcallier, from whence he beheld his towns taken and his palace of Rivoli destroyed: duke Schomberg exhorted him to act on the offensive, and give battle to Catinat, while that officer's army was weakened by detachments, and prince Eugene<sup>18</sup>

supported his remonstrance : but this proposal was vehemently opposed by the marquis de Leganez, who foresaw that, if the duke should be defeated, the French would penetrate into the territories of Milan. The relief of Coni, however, was undertaken by prince Eugene, who began his march for that place with a convoy guarded by 2200 horse : at Magliano he was reinforced by 5000 militia. Bulonde, who commanded at the siege, no sooner heard of his approach, than he retired with the utmost precipitation, leaving behind some pieces of cannon, mortars, bombs, arms, ammunition, tents, provisions, utensils, with all his sick and wounded : when he joined Catinat, he was immediately put under arrest, and afterwards cashiered with disgrace. Hoguette abandoned the valley of Aoste ; Feuquieres was sent with a detachment to change the garrison of Casal ; and Catinat retired with his army towards Villa Nova d'Aste.

6. The miscarriage of the French before Coni affected Louvois, the minister of Louis, so deeply, that he could not help shedding tears when he communicated the event to his master, who told him with great composure that he was spoiled by good fortune : but the retreat of the French from Piedmont had a still greater influence over the resolutions of the conclave at Rome, then sitting for the election of a new pope, in the room of Alexander VIII. who died in the beginning of February. Notwithstanding the power and intrigues of the French faction, headed by cardinal d'Etrées, the affairs of Piedmont had no sooner taken this turn, than the Italians joined the Spanish and imperial interest, and cardinal Pignatelli, a Neapolitan, was elected pontiff : he assumed the name of Innocent, in honor of the late pope known by that appellation, and adopted all his maxims against the French monarch. When the German auxiliaries arrived, under the command of the elector of Bavaria, the confederates resolved to give battle to Catinat ; but he re-passed the Po, and sent couriers to Versailles, to solicit a reinforcement : then prince Eugene invested Carmagnola, the celebrated Olympia de Mancini, niece of cardinal Mazarin. Prince Eugene, finding himself neglected at the court of France, engaged as a soldier of fortune in the service of the emperor, and soon distinguished himself by his great military talents : he was, moreover, an accomplished gentleman, learned, liberal, mild, and courteous ; an unshaken friend, a generous enemy, an invincible captain, a consummate politician.

and carried on the siege with such vigor, that in eleven days the garrison capitulated : meanwhile the marquis de Hoquincourt undertook the conquest of Montmelian, and reduced the town without much resistance : the castle, however, made such a vigorous defence, that Catinat marched thither in person ; and, notwithstanding all his efforts, the place held out till the second of December, when it surrendered on honorable conditions.

7. This summer produced nothing of importance on the Rhine : the French endeavored to surprise Mentz, by maintaining a correspondence with one of the emperor's commissioners ; but this being discovered, their design was frustrated. The imperial army, under the elector of Saxony, passed the Rhine in the neighborhood of Manheim ; and the French, crossing the same river at Philipsburg, reduced the town of Portzheim in the marquisate of Baden-Dourlach : the execution of the scheme projected by the emperor for this campaign was prevented by the death of his general, the elector of Saxony, which happened on the second of September : his affairs wore a more favorable aspect in Hungary, where the Turks were totally defeated by prince Louis of Baden on the banks of the Danube : the imperialists afterwards undertook the siege of Great Waradin in Transylvania ; but this was turned into a blockade, and the place was not surrendered till the following spring. The Turks were so dispirited by the defeat by which they had lost the grand visir, that the emperor might have made peace on very advantageous terms ; but his pride and ambition overshot his success : he was weak, vain, and superstitious : he imagined that now the war of Ireland was almost extinguished, king William, with the rest of his allies, would be able to humble the French power, though he himself should not co-operate with heretics, whom he abhorred ; and that in the mean time, he should not only make an intire conquest of Transylvania, but also carry his victorious arms to the gates of Constantinople, according to some ridiculous prophecy by which his vanity had been flattered. The Spanish government was become so feeble, that the ministry, rather than be at the expense of defending the Netherlands, offered to deliver the whole country to king William, either as monarch of England, or stadtholder of the United Provinces : he declined this offer, because he knew the people would never be reconciled to a protestant government ; but he proposed that the Spaniards should confer the administration of Flanders on the elector of Bavaria, who was ambitious of signalling his courage, and able to defend the country with his own troops and treasure: this proposal was relished by the court of Spain: the emperor imparted it to the elector, who accepted the office without hesitation; and he was immediately declared governor of the Low Countries by the council of state at Madrid. King William, after his return from the army, continued some time at the Hague, settling the operations of the ensuing campaign: that affair being discussed, he embarked in the Maese, and landed in England on the nineteenth of October.

8. Before we explain the proceedings in parliament, it will be necessary to give a detail of the late transactions in Ireland. In the beginning of the season, the French king had sent a large supply of provisions, clothes, and ammunition for the use of the Irish at Limerick, under the conduct of Monsieur St. Ruth, accompanied by a great number of French officers furnished with commissions from king James, though St. Ruth issued all his orders in the name of Louis: Tyrconnel had arrived in January with three frigates and nine vessels, laden with succors of the same nature; otherwise the Irish could not have been so long kept together: nor, indeed, could these supplies prevent them from forming separate and independent bands of Rapparees, who plundered the country, and committed the most shocking barbarities. The lords justices, in conjunction with general Ginckel, had taken every step their prudence could suggest, to quiet the disturbances of the country, and prevent such violence and rapine, of which the soldiers in king William's army were not intirely innocent: the justices had issued proclamations denouncing severe penalties against those who should countenance or conceal such acts of cruelty and oppression; they promised to protect all papists who should live quietly within a certain frontier line; and Ginckel gave the catholic rebels to understand, that he was authorised to treat with them, if they were inclined to return to their duty. Before the armies took the field, several skirmishes had been fought between parties; and these had always turned out so unfortunate to the enemy, that their spirits were quite depressed, while the confidence of the English rose in the same proportion.

9. St. Ruth and Tyrconnel were joined by the Rapparees, and general Ginckel was reinforced by Mackay with those troops which had reduced the highlanders in Scotland:

thus strengthened, he, in the beginning of June, marched from Mullingar to Ballymore, which was garrisoned by 1000 men under colonel Bourke, who, when summoned to surrender, returned an evasive answer : but, when a breach was made in the place, and the besiegers began to make preparations for a general assault, his men laid down their arms, and submitted at discretion. The fortifications of this place being repaired and augmented, the general left a garrison for its defence, and advanced to Athlone, situated on the other side of the Shannon ; and, supported by the Irish army, encamped almost under its walls : the English town, on the hither side of the river, was taken sword in hand, and the enemy broke down an arch of the bridge in their retreat : batteries were raised against the Irish town, and several unsuccessful attempts were made to force the passage of the bridge, which was defended with great vigor : at length, it was resolved in the council of war, that a detachment should pass at a ford a little to the left of the bridge, though the river was deep and rapid, the bottom foul and stony, and the pass guarded by a ravelin, erected for that purpose. The forlorn hope consisted of sixty grenadiers in armor, headed by captain Sands and two lieutenants : they were seconded by another detachment, and this was supported by six battalions of infantry. Never was a more desperate service, nor was ever exploit performed with more valor and intrepidity : they passed twenty abreast, in the face of the enemy, through an incessant shower of balls, bullets, and grenades : those who followed them took possession of the bridge, and laid planks over the broken arch : pontoons were fixed at the same time, that the troops might pass in different places. The Irish were amazed, confounded, and abandoned the town in the utmost consternation ; so that, in half an hour, it was wholly secured by the English, who did not lose above fifty men in the attack : Mackay, Tetteau, and Ptolemache exhibited proofs of the most undaunted courage in passing the river ; and general Ginckel, for his conduct, intrepidity, and success on this occasion, was created earl of Athlone. When St. Ruth was informed, by express, that the English had entered the river, he said it was impossible they should pretend to take a town which he covered with his army ; and that he would give a thousand pistoles if they would attempt to force a passage. Sarsfield insisted on the truth of the intelligence, and pressed him to send succors to the town : he ridiculed this officer's fears, and some warm expostulation passed between them : being at length convinced that the English were in possession of the place, he ordered some detachments to drive them out again ; but the cannon of their own works being turned against them, they found the task impracticable, and that very night their army decamped : St. Ruth, after a march of ten miles, took post at Aghrim ; and having, by drafts from garrisons, augmented his army to 25,000 men, resolved to hazard a decisive engagement.

10. Ginckel, having put Athlone in a posture of defence, passed the Shannon, and marched up to the enemy, determined to give them battle ; though his forces did not exceed 18,000, and the Irish were posted in a very advantageous situation. St. Ruth had made an admirable disposition, and taken every precaution that military skill could suggest : his centre extended along a rising ground, uneven in many places, intersected with banks and ditches, joined by lines of communication, and fronted by a large bog almost impassable : his right was fortified with intrenchments, and his left secured by the castle of Aghrim. He harangued his army in the most pathetic strain, conjuring them to exert their courage in defence of their holy religion, in the extirpation of heresy, in recovering their ancient honors and estates, and in restoring a pious king to the throne, from whence he had been expelled by an unnatural usurper : he employed the priests to enforce his exhortations ; to assure the men that they might depend on the prayers of the church ; and that in case they should fall in battle, the saints and angels would convey their souls to heaven : they are said to have sworn on the sacrament that they would not desert their colors, and to have received an order that no quarter should be given to the French heretics in the army of the prince of Orange. Ginckel had encamped on the Roscommon side of the river Sue, within three miles of the enemy : after having reconnoitred their posture, he resolved, with the advice of a council of war, to attack them on Sunday the twelfth of July. The necessary orders being given, the army passed the river at two fords and a stone bridge ; and, advancing to the edge of the great bog, began about twelve o'clock to force the two passages, in order to possess the ground on the other side : the enemy fought with surprising fury, and the horse were several times repulsed ; but, at length, the troops on the right carried their point by means of some field pieces. The day was now so far advanced, that the general determined to postpone the battle till next morning; but perceiving some disorder among the enemy, and fearing they would decamp in the night, he altered his resolution, and ordered the attack to be renewed. At six o'clock in the evening the left wing of the English advanced to the right of the Irish, from whom they met with such a warm and obstinate reception, that it was not without the most surprising efforts of courage and perseverance that they at length obliged them to give ground; and even then they lost it by inches. St. Ruth, seeing them in danger of being overpowered, immediately detached succors to them from his centre and left wing: Mackay no sooner perceived them weakened by these detachments, than he ordered three battalions to skirt the bog, and attack them on the left; while the centre advanced through the middle of the morass, the men wading up to the waist in mud and water: after they had reached the other side, they found themselves obliged to ascend a rugged hill, fenced with hedges and ditches; and these were lined with musketeers, supported at proper intervals with squadrons of cavalry. They made such a desperate resistance, and fought with such impetuosity, that the assailants were repulsed into the middle of the bog with great loss, and St. Ruth exclaimed, 'Now will I drive the English to the gates of Dublin.' In this critical conjuncture Ptolemache came up with a fresh body to sustain them, rallied the broken troops, and renewed the charge with such vigor, that the Irish gave way in their turn, and the English recovered the ground they had lost, though they found it impossible to improve their advantage. Mackay brought a body of horse and dragoons to the assistance of the left wing, and first turned the tide of battle in favor of the English: major-general Rouvigny, who had behaved with great gallantry during the whole action, advanced with five regiments of cavalry to support the centre; when St. Ruth, perceiving his design, resolved to fall on him in a dangerous hollow way, which he was obliged to pass: for this purpose he began to descend Kircommodon-hill with his whole reserve of horse; but in his way was killed by a cannon-ball: his troops immediately halted, and his guards retreated with his body: his fate dispirited the troops, and produced such confusion as Sarsfield could not remedy; for though he was next in command, he had been at variance with St. Ruth since the affair at Athlone, and was ignorant of the plan he had concerted. Rouvigny, having passed the hollow way without opposition, charged the enemy in flank, and bore down all before him with surprising impetuosity : the centre redoubled their efforts, and pushed the Irish to the top of the hill ; and then the whole line giving way at once from right to left, threw down their arms : the foot fled towards a bog in their rear, and their horse took the route by the highway to Loughneagh ; both were pursued by the English cavalry, who for four miles made a terrible slaughter. In the battle, which lasted two hours, and in the pursuit, above 4000 of the enemy were slain, and 600 taken, together with all their baggage, tents, provisions, ammunition, and artillery, nine-and-twenty pair of colors, twelve standards, and almost all the arms of the infantry : in a word, the victory was decisive, and not above 800 of the English were killed on the field of battle. The vanquished retreated in great confusion to Limerick, where they resolved to make a final stand, in hope of receiving such succors from France, as would either enable them to retrieve their affairs, or obtain good terms from the court of England : there Tyrconnel died of a broken heart, after having survived his authority and reputation : he had incurred the contempt of the French, as well as the hatred of the Irish, whom he had advised to submit to the new government rather than totally ruin themselves and their families.

11. Immediately after the battle, detachments were sent to reduce Portumny, Bonnachar, and Moore-castle, considerable passes on the Shannon, which were accordingly secured : then Ginckel advanced to Galway, which he summoned to surrender ; but he received a defiance from lord Dillon and general D'Ussone, who commanded the garrison : the trenches were immediately opened ; a fort which commanded the approaches to the town was taken by assault ; six regiments of foot and four squadrons of horse passed the river on pontoons ; and the place being wholly invested, the governor thought proper to capitulate : the garrison marched out with the honors of war, and was allowed safe conduct to Limerick : Ginckel directed his march to the same town, which was the only post of consequence that now held out for king James : within four miles of the place he halted, until the heavy cannon could be brought from Athlone : hearing that Luttrell had been seized by the French general D'Ussone, and sentenced to be shot for having proposed to surrender, he sent a trumpet, to tell the commander, that if any person should be put to death for such a proposal, he would make retaliation on the Irish prisoners. On the twenty-fifth of August the enemy were driven from all their advanced posts: captain Cole, with a squadron of ships, sailed up the Shannon, and his frigates anchored in sight of the town: on the twenty-sixth of the month the batteries were opened, and a line of contravallation was formed: the Irish army lay encamped on the other side of the river, on the road to Killaloe, and the fords were guarded with four regiments of their dragoons: on the fifth of September, after the town had been almost laid in ruins by the bombs, and large breaches made in the walls by the battering cannon, the guns were dismounted, the out-forts evacuated, and such other motions made as indicated a resolution to abandon the siege. The enemy expressed their joy in loud acclamations; but this was of short continuance: in the night the besiegers began to throw a bridge of pontoons over the river, about a mile higher up than the camp; and this work was finished before morning: a considerable body of horse and foot had passed when the alarm was given to the enemy, who were seized with such consternation, that they threw down their arms, and betook themselves to flight, leaving behind them their tents, baggage, two pieces of cannon, and one standard: the bridge was immediately removed nearer the town, and fortified; all the fords and passes were secured, and the batteries continued firing incessantly till the twenty-second of the month, when Ginckel passed over with a division of the army and fourteen pieces of cannon: about four in the afternoon, the grenadiers attacked the forts that commanded Thomond-bridge, and carried them sword in hand after an obstinate resistance: the garrison had made a sally from the town to support them; and this detachment was driven back with such precipitation, that the French officer on command in that quarter, fearing the English would enter pell-mell with the fugitives, ordered the bridge to be drawn up, leaving his own men to the fury of a victorious enemy: 600 were killed, 200 taken prisoners, including many officers; and a great number were drowned in the Shannon.

12. Then the English made a lodgement within ten paces of the bridge-foot; and the Irish, seeing themselves surrounded on all sides, determined to capitulate: general Sarsfield and colonel Wahop signified their resolution to Scravenmore and Rouvigny; hostages were exchanged; a negociation was immediately begun, and hostilities ceased on both sides of the river: the lords justices arrived in the camp on the first of October, and on the fourth the capitulation was executed, extending to all the places in the kingdom that were still in the hands of the Irish. The Roman catholics were restored to the enjoyment of such liberty in the exercise of religion as was consistent with the laws of Ireland, and conformable with that which they possessed in the reign of Charles II. All persons whatever were entitled to the protection of these laws, and restored to the possession of their estates, privileges, and immunities, on their submitting to the present government, and taking the oath of allegiance to their majesties king William and queen Mary, excepting, however, certain persons who were forfeited or exiled: this article even extended to all merchants of Limerick, or any other garrison possessed by the Irish, who happened to be abroad, and had not borne arms since the declaration in the first year of the present reign, provided they should return within the term of eight months. All the persons comprised in this and the foregoing article were indulged with a general pardon of all attainders, outlawries, treasons, misprisions of treason, premunires, felonies, trespasses, and other crimes and misdemeanors whatsoever, committed since the beginning of the reign of James II. and the lords justices promised to use their best endeavors towards the reversal of such attainders and outlawries as had passed against any of them in parliament. In order to allay the violence of party, and extinguish private animosities, it was agreed that no person should be sued or impleaded on either side for any trespass, or made accountable for the rents, tenements, lands, or houses he had received or enjoyed since the beginning of the war: every nobleman and gentleman comprised in these articles was authorised to keep a sword, a case of pistols, and a gun for his defence or amusement: the inhabitants of Limerick and other garrisons were permitted to remove their goods and chattels, without search, visitation, or payment of duty: the lords justices promised to use their best endeavors, that all persons comprehended in this capitulation should for eight months be protected from all arrests and executions for debt or damage: they undertook, that their majesties should ratify these articles within the space of eight months, and use their endeavors that they might be ratified and confirmed in parliament: the subsequent article was calculated to indemnify colonel John Brown, whose estate and effects had been seized for the use of the Irish army by Tyrconnel and Sarsfield, which last had been created lord Lucan by king James, and was now mentioned by that title : all persons were indulged with free leave to remove with their families and effects to any other country except England and Scotland : all officers and soldiers in the service of king James, comprehending even the Rapparees, willing to go beyond sea, were at liberty to march in bodies to the places of embarkation, to be conveyed to the continent with the French officers and troops : they were furnished with passports, convoys, and carriages by land and water ; and general Ginckel engaged to provide seventy ships, if necessary, for their transportation, with two men of war for the accommodation of their officers, and to serve as a convoy to the fleet. It was stipulated, that the provisions and forage for their subsistence should be paid for on their arrival in France ; that hostages should be given for this indemnification, as well as for the return of the ships ; that all the garrisons should march out of their respective towns and fortresses with the honors of war ; that the Irish should have liberty to transport 900 horses ; that those who should choose to stay behind might dispose of themselves according to their own fancy, after having surrendered their arms to such commissioners as the general should appoint ; that all prisoners of war should be set at liberty on both sides ; that the general should provide two vessels to carry over two different persons to France, with intimation of this treaty ; and that none of those who were willing to quit the kingdom should be detained on account of debt or any other pretence. This is the substance of the famous treaty of Limerick, which the Irish Roman catholics considered as the great charter of their civil and religious liberties. The town of Limerick was surrendered to Ginckel ; but both sides agreed that the two armies should intrench themselves till the Irish could embark, that no disorders might arise from a communication.

13. The protestant subjects of Ireland were extremely disgusted at these concessions made in favor of vanquished rebels, who had exercised such acts of cruelty and rapine : they complained, that they themselves, who had suffered for their loyalty to king William, were neglected, and obliged to sit down with their losses, while their enemies, who had shed so much blood in opposing his government, were indemnified by the articles of the capitulation, and even avored with particular indulgences: they were dismissed with the honors of war; they were transported at the government's expense, to fight against the English in foreign countries; an honorable provision was made for the Rapparees, who were professed banditti; the Roman catholic interest in Ireland obtained the sanction of regal authority; attainders were overlooked, forfeitures annulled, pardons extended, and laws set aside, in order to effect a pacification. Ginckel had received orders to put an end to the war at any rate, that William might convert his whole influence and attention to the affairs of the continent. When the articles of capitulation were ratified, and hostages exchanged for their being duly executed, about 2000 Irish foot and 300 horse began their march for Cork, where they proposed to take shipping for France, under the conduct of Sarsfield; but three regiments, refusing to quit the kingdom, delivered up their arms, and dispersed to their former habitations. Those who remained at Limerick embarked on the seventh of November, in French transports, and sailed immediately to France, under the convoy of a French squadron, which had arrived in the bay of Dingle immediately after the capitulation was signed: 12,000 men chose to undergo exile from their native country rather than submit to the government of king William. When they arrived in France, they were welcomed by a letter from James, who thanked them for their loyalty; assured them they should still serve under his commission and command; and that the king of France had already given orders for their being new clothed, and put into quarters of refreshment.

14. The reduction of Ireland being thus completed, baron Ginckel returned to England, where he was solemnly thanked by the house of commons for his great services, after he had been created earl of Athlone by his majesty. When the parliament met on the twenty-second of October, the king, in his speech, insisted on the necessity of sending a strong fleet to sea early in the season, and of maintaining a considerable army, to annoy the enemy abroad, as well as to protect the kingdom from insult and invasion; for which purposes, he said, 65,000 men would be barely sufficient: each house presented an address of congratulation on his majesty's safe return to England, and on the reduction of Ireland: they promised to assist him, to the utmost of their power, in prosecuting the war with France; and, at the same time, drew up addresses to the queen, acknowledging her prudent administration during his majesty's absence. Notwithstanding this appearance of cordiality and complaisance, a spirit of discontent had insinuated itself into both houses of parliament, and even infected great part of the nation.

15. A great number of individuals, who wished well to their country, could not without anxiety and resentment behold the interest of the nation sacrificed to foreign connexions, and the king's favor so partially bestowed on Dutchmen, in prejudice to his English subjects: they observed that the number of forces he demanded was considerably greater than that of any army which had ever been paid by the public, even when the nation was in the most imminent danger; that, instead of contributing as allies to the maintenance of the war on the continent, they had embarked as principals, and bore the greatest part of the burden, though they had the least share of the profit: they even insinuated, that such a standing army was more calculated to make the king absolute at home than to render him formidable abroad; and the secret friends of the late king did not fail to enforce these insinuations: they renewed their animadversions on the disagreeable part of his character; they dwelt on his proud reserve, his sullen silence, his imperious disposition, and his base ingratitude, particularly to the earl of Marlborough, whom he had dismissed from all his employments immediately after the signal exploits he had performed in Ireland. The disgrace of this nobleman was partly ascribed to the freedom with which he had complained of the king's undervaluing his services, and partly to the intrigues of his wife, who had gained an ascendancy over the princess Anne of Denmark; and is said to have employed her influence in fomenting a jealousy between the two sisters. The malcontents of the whiggish faction, enraged to find their credit declining at court, joined in the cry which the Jacobites had raised against the government: they scrupled not to say, that the arts of corruption were shamefully practised, to secure a majority in parliament; that the king was as tender of the prerogative as any of his predecessors had ever been; and that he even ventured to admit Jacobites into his council, because they were the known tools of arbitrary power. These reflections alluded to the earls of Rochester and Ranelagh, who, with Sir Edward Seymour, had been lately created privy-counsellors: Rochester entertained very high notions of regal authority; he proposed severity as one of the best supports of government; was clear in his understanding, violent in his temper, and uncorrupt in his principles: Ranelagh was a man of parts and pleasure, who possessed the most plausible and winning address; and was capable of transacting the most important and intricate affairs in the midst of riot and debauchery; he had managed the revenue of Ireland in the reign of Charles II. he enjoyed the office of pay-master in the army of king James; and now maintained the same footing under the government of William and Mary: Sir Edward Seymour was the proudest commoner in England, and the boldest orator that ever filled the speaker's chair: he was intimately acquainted with the business of the house; and knew every individual member so exactly, that with one glance of his eye he could prognosticate the fate of every motion: he had opposed the court with great acrimony, questioned the king's title, censured his conduct, and reflected on his character: nevertheless, he now became a proselyte, and was brought into the treasury.

16. The commons voted £3,411,675, for the use of the ensuing year; but the establishment of funds for raising these supplies was retarded, partly by the ill-humor of the opposition, and partly by intervening affairs that diverted the attention of the commons. Several eminent merchants presented a petition to the house against the East-India company, charging them with manifold abuses; at the same time, a counter-petition was delivered by the company, and the affair referred to the examination of a committee appointed for that purpose: after a minute inquiry into the nature of the complaints, the commons voted certain regulations with respect to the stock and the traffic; and resolved to petition his majesty, that, according to the said regulations, the East India company should be incorporated by charter: the committee was ordered to bring in a bill for this establishment; but divers petitions being presented against it, and the company's answers proving unsatisfactory, the house addressed the king to dissolve it, and grant a charter to a new company. He said it was an affair of great importance to the trade of the kingdom; therefore, he would consider the subject, and in a little time return a positive answer. The parliament was likewise amused by a pretended conspiracy of the papists in Lancashire to raise a rebellion and restore James to the throne: several persons were seized, and some witnesses examined; but nothing appeared to justify the information:

at length, one Fuller, a prisoner in the king's bench, offered his evidence, and was brought to the bar of the house of commons, where he produced some papers. He obtained a blank pass from the king for two persons, who, he said, would come from the continent to give evidence: he was afterwards examined at his own lodgings, where he affirmed, that colonel Thomas Delaval and James Hayes were the witnesses for whom he had procured the pass and the protection: search was made for them, according to his direction; but no such persons were found: then the house declared Fuller a notorious impostor, cheat, and false accuser: he was, at the request of the commons, prosecuted by the attorney-general, and sentenced to stand in the pillory; a disgrace which he accordingly underwent.

17. A bill for regulating trials in cases of high treason having been laid aside by the lords in the preceding session, was now again brought on the carpet, and passed the lower house: the design of this bill was to secure the subject from the rigors to which he had been exposed in the late reigns: it provided, that the prisoner should be furnished with a copy of his indictment, as also of the panel, ten days before his trial; and that his witnesses should be examined on oath, as well as those of the crown. The lords in their own behalf added a clause, enacting, that on the trial of any peer or peeress for treason or misprision of treason, all the peers who have a right to sit and vote in parliament should be duly summoned to assist at the trial; that this notice should be given twenty days before the trial; and that every peer so summoned and appearing should vote on the occasion: the commons rejected this amendment, and a free conference ensued. The point was argued with great vivacity on both sides, which served only to inflame the dispute, and render each party the more tenacious of their own opinion: after three conferences, that produced nothing but animosity, the bill was dropped; for the commons resolved to bear the hardships of which they complained, rather than be relieved at the expense of purchasing a new privilege to the lords; and without this advantage the peers would not contribute to their relief.

18. The next object that engrossed the attention of the lower house was the miscarriage of the fleet during the summer's expedition. Admiral Russell, who commanded at sea, having been joined by a Dutch squadron, sailed in quest of the enemy; but, as the French king had received undoubted intelligence that the combined squadrons were superior to his navy in number of ships and weight of metal, he ordered Tourville to avoid an engagement. This officer acted with such vigilance, caution, and dexterity, as baffled all the endeavors of Russell, who was moreover perplexed with obscure and contradictory orders: nevertheless, he cruised all summer, either in the channel or in soundings, for the protection of the trade, and, in particular, secured the homeward-bound Smyrna fleet, in which the English and Dutch had a joint concern, amounting to £4,000,000 sterling: having scoured the channel, and sailed along great part of the French coast, he returned to Torbay in the beginning of August, and received fresh orders to put to sea again, notwithstanding his repeated remonstrances against exposing large ships to the storms that always blow about the time of the equinox: he therefore sailed back to soundings, where he continued cruising till the second of September, when he was overtaken by a violent tempest, which drove him into the channel, and obliged him to make for the port of Plymouth. The weather being hazy, he reached the Sound with great difficulty: the Coronation, a second-rate, foundered at anchor off the Ram-head: the Harwich, a third-rate, bulged on the rocks, and perished: two others ran ashore, but were got off with little damage: but the whole fleet was scattered and distressed. The nation murmured at the supposed misconduct of the admiral, and the commons subjected him to an inquiry; but when they examined his papers, orders, and instructions, they perceived he had adhered to them with great punctuality, and thought proper to drop the prosecution out of tenderness to the ministry. Then the house took into consideration some letters which had been intercepted in a French ship taken by Sir Ralph Delaval: three of these are said to have been written by king James, and the rest sealed with his seal: they related to the plan of an insurrection in Scotland, and in the northern parts of England: Legge, lord Dartmouth, with one Crew, being mentioned in them as agents and abettors in the design, warrants were immediately issued against them; Crew absconded, but lord Dartmouth was committed to the Tower: lord Preston was examined touching some ciphers which they could not explain; and, pretending ignorance, was imprisoned in Newgate, from whence, however, he soon obtained his release. The funds for the supplies of the ensuing year being established, and several acts<sup>19</sup> passed relating to domestic regulations, the king, on the twenty-fourth of February, closed the session with a short speech, thanking the parliament for their demonstrations of affection in the liberal supplies they had granted, and communicating his intention of repairing speedily to the continent: then the two houses, at his desire, adjourned themselves to the twelfth of April; and the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-ninth of May by proclamation.<sup>20</sup>

19. The king had suffered so much in his reputation by his complaisance to the presbyterians of Scotland, and was so displeased with the conduct of that stubborn sect of religionists, that he thought proper to admit some prelatists into the administration: Johnston, who had been sent envoy to the elector of Brandenburg, was recalled, and, with the master of Stair, made joint secretary of Scotland; Melvil, who had declined in his importance, was made lord privy-seal of that kingdom: Tweeddale was constituted lord chancellor: Crawford retained the office of president of the council; and Lothian was appointed high commissioner to the general assembly. The parliament was adjourned to the fifteenth of April, because it was not yet compliant enough to be assembled with safety; and the episcopal clergy were admitted to a share of the church-government. These measures, instead of healing the divisions, served only to inflame the animosity of the two parties: the episcopalians triumphed in the king's favor, and began to treat their antagonists with insolence and scorn; the presbyterians were incensed to see their friends disgraced, and their enemies distinguished by the royal indulgence: they insisted on the authority of the law, which happened to be on their side; they became more than ever sour, surly, and implacable; they refused to concur with the prelatists, or abate in the least circumstance of discipline; and the assembly was dissolved, without any time or place assigned for the next meeting: the presbyterians pretended an independent right of assembling annually, even without a call from his majesty; they therefore adjourned themselves, after having protested against the dissolution: the king resented this measure, as an insolent invasion of the prerogative; and conceived an aversion to the whole sect, who in their turn began to lose all respect for his person and government.

<sup>20</sup> In the course of this session, Dr. Welwood, a Scottish physician, was taken into custody, and reprimanded at the bar of the house of commons, for having reflected on that house in a weekly paper entitled Mercurius Reformatus; but, as it was written in defence of the government, the king appointed him one of his physicians in ordinary. At this period, Charles Montagu, afterwards earl of Halifax, distinguished himself in the house of commons by his fine talents and eloquence: the privy seal was committed to the earl of Pembroke; lord viscount Sidney was created lord lieutenant of Ireland; Sir John Somers appointed attorney general; and the see of Lincoln, vacant by the death of Barlow, conferred on Dr. Thomas Tennison, who had been recommended to the king as a divine remarkable for his piety and moderation.

20. As the highlanders were not yet totally reduced, the earl of Breadalbane undertook to bring them over, by distributing sums of money among their chiefs; and £15,000 were remitted from England for this purpose: the clans being informed of this remittance, suspected that the earl's design was to appropriate to himself the best part of the money; and when he began to treat with them, made such extravagant demands, that he found his scheme impracticable: he was therefore obliged to refund the sum he had received; and he resolved to wreak his vengeance with the first opportunity on those who had frustrated his intention. He who chiefly thwarted this negotiation was Macdonald of Glencoe, whose opposition rose from a private circumstance, which ought to have had no effect on a treaty that regarded the public weal: Macdonald had plundered the lands of Breadalbane during the course of hostilities; and this nobleman insisted on being indemnified for his losses from the other's share of the money which he was employed to distribute: the highlander not only refused to acquiesce in these terms, but by his influence among the clans defeated the whole scheme, and the earl in revenge devoted him to destruction. King William had by proclamation offered an indemnity to all those who had been in arms against him, provided they would submit and take the oaths by a certain day; and this was prolonged to the close of the present year, with a denunciation of military execution against those who should hold out after the end of December : Macdonald, intimidated by this declaration, repaired on the very last day of the month to Fort William, and desired that the oaths might be tendered to him by colonel Hill, governor of that fortress : as this officer was not vested with the power of a civil magistrate, he refused to administer them ; and Macdonald set out immediately for Inverary, the county-town of Argyle : though the ground was covered with snow, and the weather intensely cold, he travelled with such diligence, that the term prescribed by the proclamation was but one day elapsed when he reached the place, and addressed himself to Sir John Campbell, sheriff of the county, who, in consideration of his disappointment at Fort-William, was prevailed on to administer the oaths to him and his adherents : then they returned to their own habitations in the valley of Glencoe, in full confidence of being protected by the government, to which they had so solemnly submitted.

21. Breadalbane had represented Macdonald at court as an incorrigible rebel ; as a ruffian inured to bloodshed and rapine, who would never be obedient to the laws of his country, nor live peaceably under any sovereign : he observed that he had paid no regard to the proclamation, and proposed that the government should sacrifice him to the quiet of the kingdom, in extirpating him, with his family and dependents, by military execution : his advice was supported by the suggestions of the other Scottish ministers ; and the king, whose chief virtue was not humanity, signed a warrant for the destruction of those unhappy people, though it does not appear that he knew of Macdonald's submission. An order for this barbarous execution, signed and countersigned by his majesty's own hand, being transmitted to the master of Stair, secretary for Scotland, this minister sent particular directions to Livingstone, who commanded the troops in that kingdom, to put the inhabitants of Glencoe to the sword, charging him to take no prisoners, that the scene might be more terrible. In the month of February, captain Campbell, of Glenlyon, by virtue of an order from major Duncannon, marched into the valley of Glencoe, with a company of soldiers belonging to Argyle's regiment, on pretence of levying the arrears of the land-tax and hearth-money : when Macdonald demanded whether they came as friends or enemies, he answered as friends, and promised, on his honor, that neither he nor his people should sustain the least injury : in consequence of this declaration, he and his men were received with the most cordial hospitality, and lived fifteen days with the men of the valley in all the appearance of the most unreserved friendship : at length the fatal period approached : Macdonald and Campbell, having passed the day together, parted about seven in the evening with mutual professions of the warmest affection : the younger Macdonald, perceiving the guards doubled, began to suspect some treachery, and communicated his suspicion to his brother ; but neither he nor the father would harbor the least doubt of Campbell's sincerity ; nevertheless, the two young men went forth privately to make farther observations : they overheard the common soldiers say they liked not the work ; that though they would have willingly fought the Macdonalds of the glen fairly in the field, they held it base to murder them in cool blood ; but that their officers were answerable for the treachery. When the youths hasted back to apprise their father of the impending danger, they saw the house already surrounded ; they heard the discharge of muskets, the shrieks of women and children ; and, being destitute of arms, secured their own lives by immediate flight. The savage ministers of vengeance had entered the old man's chamber, and shot him through the head : he fell down dead in the arms of his wife, who died next day distracted by the horror of her husband's fate : the laird of Auchintrincken, Macdonald's guest, who had three months before this period submitted to the government, and at this very time had a protection in his pocket, was put to death without question : a boy of eight years, who fell at Campbell's feet, imploring mercy, and offering to serve him for life, was stabbed to the heart by one Drummond, a subaltern officer : eight-and-thirty persons suffered in this manner, the greater part of whom were surprised in their beds, and hurried into eternity before they had time to implore the divine mercy. The design was to butcher all the males under seventy that lived in the valley, the number of whom amounted to 200 ; but some of the detachments did not arrive soon enough to secure the passes, so that 160 escaped. Campbell, having perpetrated this brutal massacre, ordered all the houses to be burned, made a prey of all the cattle and effects that were found in the valley, and left the helpless women and children, whose fathers and husbands he had murdered, naked and forlorn, without covering, food, or shelter, in the midst of the snow that covered the whole face of the country, at the distance of six long miles from any inhabited place : distracted with grief and horror, surrounded with the shades of night, shivering with cold, and appalled with the apprehension of immediate death from the swords of those who had sacrificed their friends and kinsmen, they could not endure such a complication of calamities, but generally perished in the waste before they could receive the least comfort or assistance. This barbarous massacre, performed under the sanction of king William's authority, answered the immediate purpose of the court, by striking terror into the hearts of the Jacobite highlanders ; but at the same time excited the horror of all those who had not renounced every sentiment of humanity ; and produced such an aversion to the government, as all the arts of a ministry could never totally surmount : a detail of the particulars was published at Paris, with many exaggerations ; and the Jacobites did not fail to expatiate on every circumstance in domestic libels and private conversation.<sup>1</sup> The king, alarmed at the outcry which was raised on this occasion, ordered an inquiry to be set on foot, and dismissed the master of Stair from his employment of secretary ; he likewise pretended that he had subscribed the order amidst a heap of other papers, without knowing the purport of it : but as he did not severely punish those who had made his authority subservient to their own cruel revenge, the imputation stuck fast to his character ; and the highlanders, though terrified into silence and submission, were inspired with the most implacable resentment against his person and administration.

22. A great number in both kingdoms waited impatiently for an opportunity to declare in behalf of their exiled monarch [1692.], who was punctually informed of all these transactions, and endeavored to make his advantage of the growing discontent. King William, having settled the domestic affairs of the nation, and exerted uncommon care and assiduity in equipping a formidable fleet, embarked for Holland on the fifth of March, and was received by the States-General with expressions of the most cordial regard : while he was here employed in promoting the measures of the grand confederacy, the French king resolved to invade England in his absence, and seemed heartily engaged in the interest of James, whose emissaries in Britain began to bestir themselves with uncommon assiduity in preparing the nation for his return. One Lant, who was imprisoned on suspicion of distributing his commissions, had the good fortune to be released, and the papists of Lancashire despatched him to the court of St. Germain, with an assurance that they were in a condition to receive their old sovereign: he returned with advice that king James would certainly land in the spring; and that colonel Parker and other officers should be sent over with full instructions, touching their conduct at and before the king's arrival: Parker accordingly repaired to England, and made the Jacobites acquainted with the whole scheme of a descent, which Louis had actually concerted with the late king: he assured them that their lawful sovereign would once more visit his British dominions, at the head of 30,000 effective men, to be embarked at La Hogue; that the transports were already prepared, and a strong squadron equipped for their convoy: he therefore exhorted them to be speedy and secret in their preparations, that they might be in readiness to take arms, and co-operate in effecting his restoration. This officer, and one Johnson, a priest, are said to have undertaken the assassination of king William; but, before they could execute their design, his majesty set sail for Holland.

23. Meanwhile James addressed a letter to several lords who had been formerly members of his council, as well as to divers ladies of quality and distinction, intimating the pregnancy of his queen, and requiring them to attend as witnesses at the labor: he took notice of the injury his family and honor had sustained, from the cruel aspersions of his enemies concerning the birth of his son; and as Providence had now favored him with an opportunity of refuting the calumny of those who affirmed that the queen was incapable of child-bearing, he assured them, in the name of his brother, the French king, as well as on his own royal word, that they should have free leave to visit his court, and return after the labor:<sup>2</sup> this invitation, however, no person would venture to accept. He afterwards employed his emissaries in circulating a printed declaration, importing that the king of France had enabled him to make another effort to retrieve his crown; and that, although he was furnished with a number of troops sufficient to untie the hands of his subjects, he did not intend to deprive them of their share in the glory of restoring their lawful king and their ancient government: he exhorted the people to join his standard: he assured them that the foreign auxiliaries should behave with the most regular discipline, and be sent back immediately after his re-establishment: he observed, that when such a number of his subjects were so infatuated as to concur with the unnatural design of the prince of Orange, he had chosen to rely on the fidelity of his English army, and refused considerable succors that were offered to him by his most christian majesty; that when he was ready to oppose force with force, he nevertheless offered to give all reasonable satisfaction to his subjects who had been misled, and endeavored to open their eyes with respect to the vain pretensions of his adversary, whose aim was not the reformation but the subversion of the government; that when he saw himself deserted by his army, betrayed by his ministers, abandoned by his favorites, and even his own children, and at last rudely driven from his own palace by a guard of insolent foreigners, he had, for his personal safety, taken refuge in France; that his retreat from the malice and cruel designs of the usurper had been construed into an abdication, and the whole constitution of the monarchy destroyed by a set of men illegally assembled, who in fact had no power to alter the property of the meanest subject: he expressed his hope, that by this time the nation had fairly examined the account; and from the losses and enormous expense of the last three years, were convinced that the remedy was worse than the disease; that the beginning, like the first years of Nero's reign, would in all probability be found the mildest part of the usurpation; and the instruments of the new establishment live to suffer severely by the tyranny they had raised; that even though the usurpation should continue during his life, an indisputable title would survive in his issue, and expose the kingdom to all the miseries of a civil war: he not only solicited, but commanded wives of Sir Thomas Stamford, lord-mayor of London; Sir William Ashhurst and Sir Richard Levett, the sheriffs; and, lastly, to Dr. Chamberlain, the famous practitioner in midwifery.

his good subjects to join him, according to their duty, and the oaths they had taken : he forbade them to pay taxes or any part of the revenue to the usurper : he promised pardon, and even rewards, to all those who should return to their duty ; and to procure in his first parliament an act of indemnity, with an exception of certain persons whom he now enumerated : <sup>3</sup> he declared that all soldiers who should quit the service of the usurper, and enlist under his banners, might depend on receiving their pardon and arrears ; and that the foreign troops, on laying down their arms, should be paid and transported to their respective countries : he solemnly protested that he would protect and maintain the church of England, as by law established, in all her rights, privileges, and possessions : he signified his resolution to use his influence with the parliament for allowing liberty of conscience to all his subjects, as an indulgence agreeable to the spirit of the christian religion, and conducive to the wealth and prosperity of the nation : he said his principal care should be to heal the wounds of the late distractions ; to restore trade by observing the act of navigation, which had been lately so much violated in favor of strangers ; to put the navy in a flourishing condition ; and to take every step that might contribute to the greatness of the monarchy and the happiness of the people : he concluded with professions of resignation to the divine will ; declaring that all who should reject his offers of mercy, and appear in arms against him, would be answerable to Almighty God for all the blood that should be spilt, and all the miseries in which these kingdoms might be involved by their desperate and unreasonable opposition.

24. While this declaration operated variously on the minds of the people, colonel Parker, with some other officers, enlisted men privately for the service of James in the counties of York, Lancaster, and in the bishopric of Durham : at the same time, Fountaine and Holman were employed in raising two regiments of horse at London, that they might join their master immediately after his landing : his partisans sent captain Lloyd with an express to lord Melfort, containing a detail of these particulars, with an assurance that they had brought over rear-admiral Carter to the interest of his majesty : they likewise transmitted a list of the ships that composed the English fleet ; and exhorted James to use his influence with the French king, that the count de Tourville might be ordered to attack them before they should be joined by the Dutch squadron. It was in consequence of this advice, that Louis commanded Tourville to fall on the English fleet, even without waiting for the Toulon squadron, commanded by the marquis d'Etrées : by this time James had repaired to La Hogue, and was ready to embark with his army, consisting of a body of French troops, together with some English and Scotch refugees, and the regiments which had been transported from Ireland by virtue of the capitulation of Limerick.

25. The ministry of England was informed of all these particulars, partly by some agents of James who betrayed his cause, and partly by admiral Carter, who gave the queen to understand he had been tampered with, and was instructed to amuse the Jacobites with a negociation. King William no sooner arrived in Holland, than he hastened the naval preparations of the Dutch, so that their fleet was ready for sea sooner than was expected ; and when he received the first intimation of the projected descent, he detached general Ptolemache with three of the English regiments from Holland : these, reinforced with other troops remaining in England, were ordered to encamp in the neighborhood of Portsmouth. The queen issued a proclamation, commanding all papists to depart from London and Westminster : the members of both houses of parliament were required to meet on the twenty-fourth of May, that she might avail herself of their advice in such a perilous conjuncture : warrants were expedited for apprehending divers disaffected persons ; and they withdrawing themselves from their respective places of abode, a proclamation was published for discovering and bringing them to justice : the earls of Scarsdale, Lichfield, and Newburgh ; the lords Griffin, Forbes ; Sir John Fenwick, Sir Theophilus Oglethorp, and others, found means to elude the search : the earls of Huntingdon and Marlborough were sent to the Tower : Edward Ridley, Knevitt, Hastings, and Robert Ferguson were imprisoned in Newgate : the bishop of Rochester was confined to his own house : the lords Brudenell and Fanshaw were secured : the earls of Dunmore, Middleton, and Sir Andrew Forrester were discovered in a quaker's house, and committed to prison, with several other persons of distinction : the trained bands of London and Westminster were armed by the queen's direction, and she reviewed them in person : admiral Russell was ordered to put to sea with all possible expedition ; and Carter, with a squadron of eighteen sail, continued to cruise along the French coast to observe the motions of the enemy.

26. On the eleventh of May, Russell sailed from Rye to St. Helens, where he was joined by the squadrons under Delaval and Carter : there he received a letter from the earl of Nottingham, intimating that a report having been spread of the queen's suspecting the fidelity of the sea officers, her majesty had ordered him to declare in her name, that she reposed the most intire confidence in their attachment, and believed the report was raised by the enemies of the government : the flag officers and captains forthwith drew up a very loyal and dutiful address, which was graciously received by the queen, and published for the satisfaction of the nation. Russell, being reinforced by the Dutch squadrons, commanded by Allemonde, Callemberg, and Vandergoes, set sail for the coast of France on the eighteenth of May, with a fleet of ninety-nine ships of the line, besides frigates and fire-ships : next day, about three o'clock in the morning, he discovered the enemy, under the count de Tourville, and threw out the signal for the line of battle, which by eight o'clock was formed in good order ; the Dutch in the van, the blue division in the rear, and the red in the centre : the French fleet did not exceed sixty-three ships of the line ; and, as they were to windward, Tourville might have avoided an engagement ; but he had received a positive order to fight, on the supposition that the Dutch and English squadrons had not joined. Louis, indeed, was apprised of their junction before they were descried by his admiral, to whom he despatched a countermanding order by two several vessels ; but one of them was taken by the English, and the other did not arrive till the day after the engagement.

27. Tourville, therefore, in obedience to the first mandate, bore down alongside of Russell's own ship, which he engaged at a very small distance: he fought with great fury till one o'clock, when his rigging and sails being considerably damaged, his ship, the Rising Sun, which carried 104 cannon, was towed out of the line in great disorder. Nevertheless, the engagement continued till three, when the fleets were parted by a thick fog: when this abated, the enemy were descried flying to the northward; and Russell made the signal for chasing: part of the blue squadron came up with the enemy about eight in the evening, and engaged them half an hour, during which admiral Carter was mortally wounded: finding himself in extremity, he exhorted his captain to fight as long as the ship could swim; and expired with great composure. At length, the French bore away for Conquest-road, having lost four ships in this day's action: next day, about eight in the morning, they were discovered crowding away to the westward; and the combined fleets chased with all the sail they could carry, until Russell's fore-topmast came by the board: though he was retarded by this accident, the fleet still continued the pursuit, and anchored near Cape La Hogue. On the twenty-second of the month, about seven in the morning, part of the French fleet was perceived near the race of Alderney, some at anchor, and some driving to the eastward with the tide of flood: Russell and the ships nearest him immediately slipped their cables and chased. The Rising Sun, having lost her masts, ran ashore near Cherburg, where she was burned by Sir Ralph Delaval, together with the Admirable, another first-rate, and the Conquerant of eighty guns: eighteen other ships of their fleet ran into La Hogue, where they were attacked by Sir George Rooke, who destroyed them, and a great number of transports laden with ammunition, in the midst of a terrible fire from the enemy, and in sight of the Irish camp: Sir John Ashby, with his own squadron and some Dutch ships, pursued the rest of the French fleet, which escaped through the race of Alderney by such a dangerous passage as the English could not attempt, without exposing their ships to the most imminent hazard. This was a very mortifying defeat to the French king, who had been so long flattered with an uninterrupted series of victories: it reduced James to the lowest ebb of despondence, as it frustrated the whole scheme of his embarkation, and overwhelmed his friends in England with grief and despair. Some historians allege that Russell did not improve his victory with all the advantages that might have been obtained, before the enemy recovered from their consternation : they say his affection to the service was in a good measure cooled by the disgrace of his friend, the earl of Marlborough ; that he hated the earl of Nottingham, by whose channel he received his orders ; and that he adhered to the letter rather than to the spirit of his instructions : but this is a malicious imputation, and a very ungrateful return for his manifold services to the nation. He acted in this whole expedition with the genuine spirit of a British admiral : he plied from the Nore to the Downs with a very scanty wind, through the dangerous sands, contrary to the advice of all his pilots ; and by this bold passage effected a junction of the different squadrons, which otherwise the French would have attacked singly, and perhaps defeated : he behaved with great gallantry during the engagement ; and destroyed about fifteen of the enemy's capital ships ; in a word, he obtained such a decisive victory, that during the remaining part of the war, the French would not hazard another battle by sea with the English.

28. Russell, having ordered Sir John Ashby, and the Dutch admiral Callemberg, to steer towards Havre de Grace, and endeavor to destroy the remainder of the French fleet, sailed back to St. Helens, that the damaged ships might be refitted, and the fleet furnished with fresh supplies of provision and ammunition ; but his principal motive was, to take on board a number of troops provided for a descent on France, which had been projected by England and Holland, with a view to alarm and distract the enemy in their own dominions. The queen was so pleased with the victory, that she ordered £30,000 to be distributed among the sailors : she caused medals to be struck in honor of the action ; and the bodies of admiral Carter and captain Hastings, who had been killed in the battle, to be interred with great funeral pomp. In the latter end of July, 7000 men, commanded by the duke of Leinster, embarked on board transports, to be landed at St. Maloes, Brest, or Rochefort ; and the nation conceived the most sanguine hopes of this expedition. A council of war, consisting of land and sea officers, being held on board the Breda, to deliberate on the scheme of the ministry, the members unanimously agreed that the season was too far advanced to put it in execution : nevertheless, the admiral having detached Sir John Ashby with a squadron, to intercept the remains of the French fleet in their passage from St. Maloes to Brest, set sail for La Hogue with the rest of the fleet and transports ; but in a few days the wind shifting, he was obliged to return to St. Helens.

29. The queen immediately despatched the marquis of Carmarthen, the earls of Devonshire, Dorset, Nottingham, and Rochester, together with lords Sidney and Cornwallis, to consult with the admiral, who demonstrated the impracticability of making an effectual descent on the coast of France at that season of the year : the design was therefore laid aside, and the forces were transported to Flanders. The higher the hopes of the nation had been raised by this armament, the deeper they felt their disappointment : a loud clamor was raised against the ministry, as the authors of this miscarriage : the people complained that they were plundered and abused ; that immense sums were extorted from them by the most grievous impositions ; that, by the infamous expedient of borrowing on established funds, their taxes were perpetuated ; that their burdens would daily increase ; that their treasure was either squandered away in chimerical projects, or expended in foreign connexions, of which England was naturally independent. They were the more excusable for exclaiming in this manner, as their trade had suffered grievously by the French privateers, which swarmed in the channel : in vain the merchants had recourse to the admiralty, which could not spare particular convoys, while large fleets were required for the defence of the nation. The French king, having nothing farther to apprehend from the English armament, withdrew his troops from the coast of Normandy ; and James returned in despair to St. Germain, where his queen had been in his absence delivered of a daughter, who was born in the presence of the archbishop of Paris, the keeper of the seals, and other persons of distinction.

30. Louis had taken the field in the latter end of May : on the twentieth of that month he arrived at his camp in Flanders, with all the effeminate pomp of an Asiatic emperor, attended by his women and parasites, his band of music, his dancers, his opera, and, in a word, by all the ministers of luxury and sensual pleasure : having reviewed his army, which amounted to about 120,000 men, he undertook the siege of Namur, which he invested on both sides of the Sambre, with about one half of his army, while the other covered the siege under the command of Luxemburg. Namur is situated on the conflux of the Meuse and the Sambre : the citadel was deemed one of the strongest forts in Flanders, strengthened with a new work contrived by the famous engineer Coehorn, who now defended it in person: the prince de Barbason commanded the garrison, consisting of 9000 men: the place was well supplied; and the governor knew that king William would make strong efforts for its relief; so that the besieged were animated with many concurring considerations. Notwithstanding these advantages, the assailants carried on their attacks with such vigor, that in seven days after the trenches were opened the town capitulated, and the garrison retired into the citadel. King William, being joined by the troops of Brandenburg and Liege, advanced to Mehaigne, at the head of 100,000 effective men, and encamped within cannon shot of Luxemburg's army, which lay on the other side of the river: that general, however, had taken such precautions, that the king of England could not interrupt the siege, nor attack the French lines without great disadvantage. The besiegers, encouraged by the presence of their monarch, and assisted by the superior abilities of Vauban their engineer, repeated their attacks with such impetuosity, that the fort of Coehorn was surrendered after a very obstinate defence, in which he himself had been dangerously wounded. The citadel, being thus left exposed to the approaches of the enemy, could not long withstand the violence of their operations: the two covered ways were taken by assault: on the twentieth of May the governor capitulated, to the unspeakable mortification of king William, who saw himself obliged to lie inactive at the head of a powerful army, and be an eyewitness of the loss of the most important fortress in the Netherlands. Louis, having taken possession of the place, returned in triumph to Versailles, where he was flattered with all the arts of adulation; while William's reputation suffered a little from his miscarriage, and the prince of Barbason incurred the suspicion of treachery or misconduct.

31. Luxemburg, having placed a strong garrison in Namur, detached Boufflers with a body of troops to La Bassiere; and with the rest of his army encamped at Soignies: the king of England sent off detachments towards Liege and Ghent; and on the sixth of July posted himself at Genap, resolved to seize the first opportunity of retrieving his honor by attacking the enemy: having received intelligence that the French general was in motion, and intended to take post between Steenkirk and Enghien, he passed the river Senne, in order to anticipate his purpose;

but, in spite of all his diligence, Luxemburg gained his point ; and William encamped at Lembeck, within six miles of the French army : here he resolved, in a council of war, to attack the enemy ; and every disposition was made for that purpose : the heavy baggage he ordered to be conveyed to the other side of the Senne ; and one Millevoix, a detected spy, was compelled by menaces to mislead Luxemburg with false intelligence, importing that he need not be alarmed at the motions of the allies, who intended the next day to make a general forage. On the twenty-fourth of July, the army began to move from the left in two columns, as the ground would not admit of their marching in an extended front : the prince of Wirtemberg began the attack on the right of the enemy, at the head of ten battalions of English, Danish, and Dutch infantry : he was supported by a considerable body of the British horse and foot, commanded by lieutenant-general Mackay. Though the ground was intersected by hedges, ditches, and narrow defiles, the prince marched with such diligence, that he was in a condition to begin the battle about two in the afternoon, when he charged the French with such impetuosity, that they were driven from their posts, and their whole camp became a scene of tumult and confusion : Luxemburg, trusting to the intelligence he had received, allowed himself to be surprised ; and it required the full exertions of his superior talents to remedy the consequences of his neglect : he forthwith forgot a severe indisposition under which he then labored ; he rallied his broken battalions ; he drew up his forces in order of battle, and led them to the charge in person : the duke de Chartres, who was then in the fifteenth year of his age, the dukes of Bourbon and Vendome, the prince of Conti, and a great number of volunteers of the first quality put themselves at the head of the household troops, and fell with great fury on the English, who were very ill supported by count Solmes, the officer who commanded the centre of the allies. The prince of Wirtemberg had taken one of the enemies' batteries, and actually penetrated into their lines ; but finding himself in danger of being overpowered by numbers, he sent an aide-de-camp twice to demand succors from Solmes, who derided his distress, saying, ' Let us see what sport these English bull-dogs will make.' At length, when the king sent an express order, commanding him to sustain the left wing, he made a motion with his horse, which could not act while his infantry kept their ground ; and the British troops, with a few Dutch and Danes, bore the whole brunt of the engagement: they fought with surprising courage and perseverance against dreadful odds; and the event of the battle continued doubtful, until Boufflers joined the French army with a great body of dragoons: the allies could not sustain the additional weight of this reinforcement, before which they gave way, though the retreat was made in tolerable order; and the enemy did not think proper to prosecute the advantage they had gained. In this action the confederates lost the earl of Angus, general Mackay, Sir John Lanier, Sir Robert Douglas, and many other gallant officers, together with about 3000 men left dead on the spot, the same number wounded or taken, a great many colors and standards, and several pieces of cannon.

32. The French, however, reaped no solid advantage from this victory, which cost them about 3000 men, including the prince of Turenne, the marquis de Bellefond, Tilladet, and Fernacon, with many officers of distinction: as for Millevois, the spy, he was hanged on a tree, on the right wing of the allied army: king William retired unmolested to his own camp; and notwithstanding all his overthrows, continued a respectable enemy, by dint of invincible fortitude, and a genius fruitful in resources. That he was formidable to the French nation, even in the midst of his ill success, appears from divers undeniable testimonies, and from none more than from the extravagance of joy expressed by the people of France, on occasion of this unimportant victory: when the princes who served in the battle returned to Paris, the roads through which they passed were almost blocked up with multitudes, and the whole air resounded with acclamation: all the ornaments of the fashion peculiar to both sexes adopted the name of Steenkirk; every individual who had been personally engaged in the action was revered as a being of a superior species; and the transports of the women rose almost to a degree of frenzy.

33. The French ministry did not intirely depend on the fortune of the war for the execution of their revenge against king William: they likewise employed assassins to deprive him of life in the most treacherous manner. When Louvois died, his son, the marquis de Barbesieux, who succeeded him in his office of secretary, found, among his papers, the draft of a scheme for this purpose, and immediately revived the design, by means of the chevalier de Grandval, a captain of dragoons in the service : he and colonel Parker engaged one Dumont, who undertook to assassinate king William : Madame de Maintenon, and Paparel, paymaster to the French army, were privy to the scheme, which they encouraged : the conspirators are said to have obtained an audience of king James, who approved of their undertaking, and assured them of his protection ; but that unfortunate monarch was unjustly charged with the guilt of countenancing the intended murder, as they communicated nothing to him but an attempt to seize the person of the prince of Orange. Dumont actually enlisted in the confederate army, that he might have the better opportunity to shoot the king of England when he should ride out to visit the lines ; while Grandval and Parker repaired to the French camp, with orders to Luxemburg to furnish them with a party of horse for the rescue of Dumont, after the blow should be struck. Whether this man's heart failed him, or he could not find the opportunity he desired, after having resided some weeks in the camp of the allies, he retired to Hanover ; but still corresponded with Grandval and Barbesieux : this last admitted one Leefdale, a Dutch baron, into the secret ; and likewise imparted it to Monsieur Chanlas, quarter-master-general of the French army, who animated Grandval and Leefdale with the promise of a considerable reward ; and promised to co-operate with Parker for bringing off Dumont, for this assassin still persisted in his undertaking : Leefdale had been sent from Holland, on purpose to dive to the bottom of this conspiracy, in consequence of advice given by the British envoy at Hanover, where Dumont had dropped some hints that alarmed his suspicion. The Dutchman not only insinuated himself into the confidence of the conspirators, but likewise inveigled Grandval to Eyndhoven, where he was apprehended. Understanding that Dumont had already discovered the design to the duke of Zell, and that he himself had been betrayed by Leefdale, he freely confessed all the particulars without enduring the torture ; and, being found guilty by a court-martial, was executed as a traitor.

34. About this period the duke of Leinster arrived at Ostend, with the troops which had been embarked at St. Helens : he was furnished with cannon sent down the Meuse from Maestricht, and reinforced by a large detachment from the king's camp at Grammont, under the command of general Ptolemache : he took possession of Furnes, was joined by the earl of Portland and M. D'Auverquerque, and a disposition was made for investing Dunkirk; but, on farther deliberation, the enterprise was thought very dangerous, and therefore laid aside: Furnes and Dixmuyde, lately reduced by brigadier Ramsay, were strengthened with new works, and secured by strong garrisons: the cannon were sent back, and the troops, returned to Ostend, re-embarked for England. This fruitless expedition, added to the inglorious issue of the campaign, increased the ill humor of the British nation: they taxed William with having lain inactive at Grammont with an army of 100,000 men, while Luxemburg was posted at Courtray with half that number: they said, if he had found the French lines too strong to be forced, he might have passed the Scheldt higher up, and not only laid the enemy's conquests under contribution, but even marched into the bowels of France; and they complained that Furnes and Dixmuyde were not worth the sums expended in maintaining their garrisons. On the twenty-sixth of September king William left the army under the command of the elector of Bavaria, and repaired to his house at Loo; in two days after his departure the camp at Grammont was broken up; the infantry marched to Marienkerke, and the horse to Caure: on the sixteenth of October, the king receiving intelligence that Boufflers had invested Charleroy, and Luxemburg taken post in the neighborhood of Condé, ordered the troops to be instantly reassembled between the village of Ixells and Halle, with design to raise the siege; and repaired to Brussels, where he held a council of war, in which the proper measures were concerted: he then returned to Holland, leaving the command with the elector of Bavaria, who forthwith began his march for Charleroy: at his approach Boufflers abandoned the siege, and moved towards Philipville. The elector, having reinforced the place, and thrown supplies into Ath, distributed his forces into winter-quarters: then Luxemburg, who had cantoned his army between Condé, Leuze, and Tournay, returned to Paris, leaving Boufflers to command in his absence.

35. The allies had been unsuccessful in Flanders, and they were not fortunate in Germany. The landgrave of Hesse Cassel undertook the siege of Eberemburg, which, however, he was obliged to abandon: the duke de Lorges, who commanded the French forces on the Rhine, surprised, defeated, and took the duke of Wirtemberg, who had posted himself with 4000 horse near Eidelsheim, to check the progress of the enemy: count Tallard, having invested Rhinefeld, the landgrave marched to its relief with such expedition, that the French were obliged to desist and retreat with considerable damage. The elector of Saxony had engaged to bring an army into the field; but he complained that the emperor left the burden of the war with France on the princes, and converted his chief power and attention to the campaign in Hungary: a jealousy and misunderstanding ensued: Schoening, the Saxon general, in his way to the hot-baths at Dablitz in Bohemia, was seized by the emperor's order, on suspicion of having maintained a private correspondence with the enemy; and very warm expostulations on this subject passed between the courts of Vienna and Dresden: Schoening was detained two years in custody; and at length released, on condition that he should never be employed again in the empire. The war in Hungary produced no event of importance: the ministry of the Ottoman Porte was distracted by factions, and the seraglio threatened with tumults: the people were tired of maintaining an unsuccessful war: the visir was deposed; and, in the midst of this confusion, the garrison of Great Waradin, which had been blocked up by the imperialists during the whole winter, surrendered on capitulation. Lord Paget, the English ambassador at Vienna, was sent to Constantinople, with powers to mediate a peace; but the terms offered by the emperor were rejected at the Porte; the Turkish army lay on the defensive, and the season was spent in a fruitless negotiation.

36. The prospect of affairs in Piedmont was favorable for the allies; but the court of France had brought the pope to an accommodation, and began to tamper with the duke of Savoy: M. Chanlais was sent to Turin with advantageous proposals, which however the duke would not accept, because he thought himself entitled to better terms, considering that the allied army in Piedmont amounted to 50,000 effective men, while Catinat's forces were not sufficient to defend his conquests in that country. In the month of July the duke marched into Dauphiné, where he plundered a number of villages, and reduced the fortress of Guillestre; then, passing the river Darance, he invested Ambrun, which after a siege of nine days surrendered on capitulation: he afterwards laid all the neighboring towns under contribution. Here duke Schomberg, who commanded the auxiliaries in the English pay, published a declaration, in the name of king William, inviting the people to join his standard; assuring them that his master had no other design in ordering his troops to invade France, but that of restoring the noblesse to their ancient splendor, their parliaments to their former authority, and the people to their just privileges: he even offered his protection to the clergy, and promised to use his endeavors for reviving the edict of Nantes, which had been guaranteed by the kings of England: these offers, however, produced little effect; and the Germans ravaged the whole country, in revenge for the cruelties which the French had committed in the palatinate. The allied army advanced from Ambrun to Gap, on the frontiers of Provence, and this place submitted without opposition: the inhabitants of Grenoble, the capital of Dauphiné, and even of Lyons, were overwhelmed with consternation; and a fairer opportunity of humbling France could never occur, as that part of the kingdom had been left almost quite defenceless; but this was fatally neglected, either from the spirit of dissension which began to prevail in the allied army, or from the indisposition of the duke of Savoy, who was seized with the small-pox in the midst of this expedition; or, lastly, from his want of sincerity, which was shrewdly suspected. He is said to have maintained a constant correspondence with the court of Versailles, in complaisance to which he retarded the operations of the confederates: certain it is, he evacuated all his conquests; and about the middle of September quitted the French territories, after having pillaged and laid waste the country through which he had penetrated.<sup>4</sup> In Catalonia the French attempted nothing of importance during this campaign, and the Spaniards were wholly inactive in that province.

37. The protestant interest in Germany acquired an accession of strength by the creation of a ninth electorate in favor of Ernest Augustus, duke of Hanover: he had, by this time, renounced all his connexions with France, and engaged to enter heartily into the interest of the allies, in consideration of his obtaining the electoral dignity. King William exerted himself so vigorously in his behalf at the court of Vienna, that the emperor agreed to the proposal, in case the consent of the other electors could be procured: this assent, however, was extorted by the importunities of the king of England, whom he durst not disoblige: Leopold was blindly bigoted to the religion of Rome, and consequently averse to a new creation, that would weaken the catholic interest in the electoral college: he therefore employed his emissaries to thwart the duke's measures: some protestant princes opposed him from motives of jealousy, and the French king used all his artifice and influence to prevent the elevation of the house of Hanover. When the duke had surmounted all this opposition so far as to gain over a majority of the electors, new objections were started: the emperor suggested that another popish electorate should be created to balance the advantage which the Lutherans would reap from that of Hanover; and he proposed that Austria should be raised to the same dignity: but violent opposition was made to this expedient, which would have vested the emperor with a double vote in the electoral college. At length, after a tedious negociation, the duke of Hanover, on the nineteenth of December, was honored with the investiture as elector of Brunswick, created great marshal of the empire, and did homage to the emperor: nevertheless, he was not yet admitted into the college, because he had not been able to procure the unanimous consent of all the electors.<sup>a</sup>

<sup>a</sup> In the beginning of September the shock of an earthquake was felt in London and many other parts of England, as well as in France, Germany, and the Netherlands: violent agitations of the same kind had happened about two months before in Sicily and Malta; and the town of Port-Royal in Jamaica was almost totally ruined by an earthquake: the place was so suddenly overflowed, that about 1500 persons perished.

Mediterranean, relieves Barcelona, and winters at Cadiz—42. Campaign in Flanders—43. The allies reduce Huy—44. The prince of Baden passes the Rhine, but is obliged to repass that river. Operations in Hungary—45. Progress of the French in Catalonia. State of the war in Piedmont—46. The king returns to England: the parliament meets: the bill for triennial parliaments receives the royal assent—47. Death of archbishop Tillotson and of queen Mary—48. Reconciliation between the king and the princess of Denmark.

1. WHILE king William seemed wholly engrossed by the affairs of the continent, England was distracted by domestic dissension, and overspread with vice, corruption, and profaneness: over and above the Jacobites, there was a set of malcontents, whose number daily increased: they not only murmured at the grievances of the nation, but composed and published elaborate dissertations on the same subject: these made such impressions on the people, already irritated by heavy burdens, distressed in their trade, and disappointed in their sanguine expectations, that the queen thought it necessary to check the progress of those writers, by issuing out a proclamation, offering a reward to such as would discover seditious libellers. The earl of Marlborough had been committed to the Tower, on the information of one Robert Young, a prisoner in Newgate, who had forged that nobleman's hand-writing, and contrived the scheme of an association in favor of king James, to which he affixed the names of the earls of Marlborough and Salisbury; Sprat, bishop of Rochester; the lord Cornbury, and Sir Basil Firebrace: one of his emissaries had found means to conceal this paper in a certain part of the bishop's house at Bromley in Kent, where it was found by the king's messengers, who secured the prelate in consequence of Young's information: but he vindicated himself to the satisfaction of the whole council; and the forgery of the informer was detected by the confession of his accomplice: the bishop obtained his release immediately, and the earl of Marlborough was admitted to bail in the court of king's-bench.

2. So many persons of character and distinction had been imprisoned during this reign on the slightest suspicion, that the discontented part of the nation had some reason to insinuate they had only exchanged one tyrant for another. They affirmed, that the habeas-corpus act was either insufficient to protect the subject from false imprisonment, or had been shamefully misused: they expatiated on the loss of ships, which had lately fallen a prey to the enemy; the consumption of seamen; the neglect of the fisheries; the interruption of commerce, in which the nation was supplanted by her allies, as well as invaded by her enemies; the low ebb of the kingdom's treasure, exhausted in hiring foreign bottoms, and paying foreign troops to fight foreign quarrels; and the slaughter of the best and bravest of their countrymen, whose blood had been lavishly spilt in support of connexions with which they ought to have had no concern: they demonstrated the mischiefs that necessarily arose from the unsettled state of the nation: they observed that the government could not be duly established until a solemn declaration should confirm the legality of that tenure by which their majesties possessed the throne; that the structure of parliaments was deficient in point of solidity, as they existed intirely at the pleasure of the crown, which would use them no longer than they should be found necessary in raising supplies for the use of the government: they exclaimed against the practice of quartering soldiers in private houses, contrary to the ancient laws of the land, the petition of rights, and the subsequent act on that subject passed in the reign of the second Charles: they enumerated among their grievances the violation of property, by pressing transport ships into the service without settling any fund of payment for the owners; the condition of the militia, which was equally burdensome and useless; the flagrant partiality in favor of allies, who carried on an open commerce with France, and supplied the enemy with necessaries; while the English labored under the severest prohibitions, and were in effect the dupes of those very powers whom they protected: they dwelt on the ministry's want of conduct, foresight, and intelligence, and inveighed against their ignorance, insolence, and neglect, which were as pernicious to the nation as if they had formed a design of reducing it to the lowest ebb of disgrace and destruction. By this time, indeed, public virtue was become the object of ridicule, and the whole kingdom was overspread with immorality and corruption, towards the increase of which many concurring circumstances happened to contribute: the people were divided into three parties, namely, the Williamites, the Jacobites, and the discontented revolutioners: these factions took all opportunities to thwart, to expose, and to ridicule the measures and principles of each other; so that patriotism was laughed out of doors, as an hypocritical pretence: this contention established a belief that every man consulted his own private interest at the expense of the public; a belief, that soon grew into a maxim almost universally adopted: the practice of bribing a majority in parliament had a pernicious influence on the morals of all ranks of people, from the candidate to the lowest borough-elect: the expedient of establishing funds of credit for raising supplies to defray the expenses of government threw large premiums and sums of money into the hands of low, sordid usurers, brokers, and jobbers, who distinguished themselves by the name of the moneyed interest: intoxicated by this flow of wealth, they affected to rival the luxury and magnificence of their superiors; but, being destitute of sentiment and taste to conduct them in their new career, they ran into the most absurd and illiberal extravagances: they laid aside all decorum; became lewd, insolent, intemperate, and riotous: their example was caught by the vulgar: all principle, and even decency, was gradually banished; talent lay uncultivated, and the land was deluged with a tide of ignorance and profligacy.

3. King William having ascertained the winter-quarters of the army, and concerted the operations of the ensuing campaign with the States-General and the ministers of the allies, set sail for England on the fifteenth of October; on the eighteenth landed at Yarmouth; was met by the queen at Newhall; and passed through the city of London to Kensington amidst the acclamations of the populace: he received a congratulatory address from the lord-mayor and aldermen, with whom he dined in public by invitation: a day of thanksgiving was appointed for the victory obtained at sea; the lute-string company was established by patent, and the parliament met on the fourth of November. The house of lords was deeply infected with discontent, which in some measure proceeded from the dissension between the queen and her sister the princess of Denmark, which last underwent every mortification that the court could inflict: her guards were taken away; all honors which had been paid to her rank by the magistrates of Bath, where she sometimes resided, and even by the ministers of the church where she attended at divine service, were discontinued, by the express order of his majesty: her cause was naturally espoused by those noblemen who had adhered to her in her former contest with the king about an independent settlement; and these were now reinforced by all the friends of the earl of Marlborough, united by a double tie; for they resented the disgrace and confinement of that lord, and thought it their duty to support the princess Anne under a persecution incurred by an attachment to his countess: the earl of Shrewsbury lived in friendship with Marlborough, and thought he had been ungratefully treated by the king: the marquis of Halifax befriended him, from opposition to the ministry: the earl of Mulgrave, for an opportunity to display his talents, and acquire that consideration which he thought due to his merit: Devonshire, Montague, and Bradford joined in the same cause from principle: the same pretence was used by the earls of Stamford, Monmouth, Warrington, and other whigs, though in effect they were actuated by jealousy and resentment against those by whom they had been supplanted: as for the Jacobites, they gladly contributed their assistance to promote any scheme that had a tendency to embroil the administration.

4. The king, in his speech to parliament, thanked them for their last supplies, congratulated them on the victory obtained at sea, condoled them on the bad success of the campaign by land, magnified the power of France, represented the necessity of maintaining a great force to oppose it, and demanded subsidies equal to the occasion: he expressed his reluctance to load them with additional burdens, which he said could not be avoided without exposing his kingdom to inevitable destruction: he desired their advice towards lessening the inconvenience of exporting money for the payment of the forces: he intimated a design of making a descent on France; declared he had no aim but to make his subjects a happy people; and that he would again cheerfully expose his life for the welfare of the nation. The lords, after an adjournment of three days, began with great warmth to assert their privileges, which they conceived had been violated in the cases of the earl of Marlborough and the other noblemen, who had been apprehended, committed to prison, and afterwards admitted to bail by the court of king's-bench. These circumstances being fully discussed in a violent debate, the house ordered lord Lucas, constable of the Tower, to produce the warrants of commitment; and the clerk of the king's-bench to deliver the affidavit of Aaron Smith, the court solicitor; on which the lords had been remanded to prison: at the same time, the whole affair was referred to a committee, empowered to send for persons, papers, and records: the judges were ordered to attend; Aaron Smith was examined touching the evidence against the committed lords. The committee reported their general resolution, which produced a vehement dispute: the opinion of the judges was unsatisfactory to both parties; the debate was referred to a committee of the whole house, in which it was resolved and declared, as the sense of that assembly, that in pursuance of the habeas-corpus act, it was the duty of the judges and jail-delivery to discharge the prisoner on bail, if committed for high-treason, unless it be made appear on oath, that there are two witnesses against the said prisoner, who cannot be produced in that term, session, or general jail-delivery: they likewise resolved, it was the intention of the said statute, that in case there should be more than one prisoner to be bailed or remanded, there must be oath made that there are two witnesses against each prisoner; otherwise he cannot be remanded to prison: these resolutions were entered in the books, as standing directions to all future judges, yet not without great opposition from the court-members. The next debate turned on the manner in which the imprisoned lords should be set at liberty: the contest became so warm, that the courtiers began to be afraid, and proposed an expedient which was put in practice: the house adjourned to the seventeenth of the month; and at its next meeting was given to understand that the king had discharged the imprisoned noblemen: after another warm debate, a formal entry was made in the journals, importing, that the house being informed of his majesty's having given directions for discharging the lords under bail in the king's-bench, the debate about that matter ceased. The resentment of the peers being thus allayed, they proceeded to take his majesty's speech into consideration.

5. The commons, having voted an address of thanks, and another praying that his majesty's foreign alliances should be laid before them, determined on a bill for regulating trials in cases of high treason. They passed a vote of thanks to admiral Russell, his officers, and seamen, for the victory they had obtained, and then proceeded to an inquiry, why that victory had not been pursued; why the descent had not been made; and why the trade had not been better protected from the enemy's cruisers. The admiral having justified his own conduct, they commanded the lords of the admiralty to produce copies of all the letters and orders which had been sent to the admiral; they ordered Russell to lay before them his answers, and the commissioners of the transports, victuallers, and office of ordnance to deliver in an account of their proceedings : then they presented addresses to the king and queen, acknowledging the favor of God in restoring him to his people ; congratulating him on his deliverance from the snares of his open and secret enemies ; and assuring him they would, according to his majesty's desire in his most gracious speech, be always ready to advise and assist him in the support of his government. The queen was thanked for her gracious and prudent administration during his majesty's absence : they congratulated her on their signal deliverance from a bold and cruel design formed for their destruction, as well as on the glorious victory which her fleet had gained ; and they assured her that the grateful sense they had of their happiness under her government should always be manifested in constant returns of duty and obedience.

6. After this formal compliment, the house, instead of proceeding to the supplies, insisted on perusing the treaties, public accounts, and estimates, that they might be in a condition to advise as well as to assist his majesty : being indulged with those papers, they passed a previous vote, that a supply should be given ; then they began to concert their articles of advice : some of the members loudly complained of partiality to foreign generals, and particularly reflected on the insolence of count Solmes, and his misconduct at Steenkirk. After some warm altercation, the house resolved one article of their advice should be, that his majesty would be pleased to fill up the vacancies that should happen among the general officers with such only as were natives of his dominions, and that the commander in chief of the English should be an Englishman : their next resolution implied, that many of the great affairs of the government having been for some time past unsuccessfully managed, the house should advise his majesty to prevent such mischiefs for the future, by employing men of knowledge, ability, and integrity : individual members inveighed bitterly against cabinet-councils, as a novelty in the British system of government, by which the privy-council was jostled out of its province : they complained that all the grievances of the nation proceeded from the vicious principles of the ministry : they observed that he who opposed the establishment could not be expected to support it with zeal : the earl of Nottingham was mentioned by name ; and the house resolved that his majesty should be advised to employ in his councils such persons only whose principles obliged them to support his rights against the late king and all other pretenders. Marlborough's interest still predominated among the commons: his friend Russell acquitted himself to the satisfaction of the house, and shifted the blame of the miscarriage on his enemy the earl of Nottingham, by declaring that twenty days elapsed between his first letter to that nobleman and his lordship's answer: the earl's friends, of whom there was a great number in the house, espoused his cause with great vigor, and even recriminated on Russell; so that a very violent debate ensued: both parties agreed that there had been mismanagement in the scheme of a descent. It was moved, that one cause of the miscarriage was the want of giving timely and necessary orders by those to whom the management of the affair was committed. The house divided, and it was carried in the affirmative by one voice only. At the next sitting of the committee, Sir Richard Temple proposed they should consider how to pay the forces abroad, by means of English manufactures, without exporting money: they resolved that the house should be moved to appoint a committee to take this expedient into consideration: Sir Francis Winnington was immediately called on to leave the chair, and the speaker resumed his place: all that had been done was now void, as no report had been made; and the committee was dissolved: the house, however, revived it, and appointed a day for its sitting; but before it could resume its deliberations, admiral Russell moved for its being adjourned, and all its purposes were defeated.

7. The court agents had by this time interposed and secured a majority by the infamous arts of corruption: the commons no longer insisted on their points of advice; their whole attention was now centred in the article of assistance. They granted about £2,000,000 for the maintenance of 33,000 seamen, the building of some additional ships of war, and the finishing of Plymouth-dock; and £750,000 to supply the deficiency of the quarterly poll. The estimates of the land-service were not discussed without tedious debates and warm disputes: the ministry demanded 54,000 men, 20,000 of whom should be kept at home for the defence of the nation, while the rest should serve abroad in the allied army: many members declared their aversion to a foreign war, in which the nation had no immediate concern, and so little prospect of success: others agreed that the allies should be assisted on the continent with a proportion of British forces ; but that the nation should act as an auxiliary, not as a principal, and pay no more than what the people would cheerfully contribute to the general expense : these reflections, however, produced no other effect than that of prolonging the debate ; ministerial influence had surmounted all opposition : the house voted the number of men demanded : such was their servile complaisance, that when they examined the treaties by which the English and Dutch contracted equally with the German princes, and found that, notwithstanding these treaties, Britain bore two-thirds of the expense ; they overlooked this flagrant instance of partiality, and enabled the king to pay the proportion : nay, their maxims were so much altered, that, instead of prosecuting their resentment against foreign generals, they assented to a motion, that the prince of Wirtemberg, the major-generals Tetteau and La Forest, who commanded the Danish troops in the pay of the States-General, should be indulged with such an addition to their appointments as would make up the difference between the pay of England and that of Holland : finally, they voted above £2,000,000 for the subsistence of the land forces, and for defraying extraordinary expenses attending the war on the continent, including subsidies to the electors of Saxony and Hanover.

8. The house of lords meanwhile was not free from animosity and contention : the Marlborough faction exerted themselves with great vivacity : they affirmed, it was the province of their house to advise the sovereign : like the commons they insisted on the king's having asked their advice, because he had mentioned that word in his speech, though he never dreamed that they would catch at it with such eagerness : they moved that the task of digesting the articles of advice should be undertaken by a joint committee of both houses ; but all the dependents of the court, including the whole bench of bishops, except Watson of St. Davids, were marshalled to oppose this motion, which was rejected by a majority of twelve ; and this victory was followed with a protest of the vanquished. Notwithstanding this defeat, they prosecuted their scheme of giving advice ; and, after much wrangling and declamation, the house agreed in an address or remonstrance, advising and beseeching his majesty, that the commanding officer of the British forces should be an Englishman ; that English officers might take rank of those in the confederate armies, who did not belong to crowned heads ; that the 20,000 men to be left for the defence of the kingdom should be all English, and commanded by an English general ; that the practice of pressing men for the fleet should be remedied ; that such officers as were guilty of this practice should be cashiered and punished ; and, lastly, that no foreigners should sit at the board of ordnance. This address was presented to the king, who received it coldly, and said he would take it into consideration.

9. Then the lords resolved to inquire into the miscarriage of the purposed descent, and called for all the papers relating to that affair ; but the aim of the majority was not so much to rectify the errors of the government, as to screen Nottingham, and censure Russell : that nobleman produced his own book of entries, together with the whole correspondence between him and the admiral, whom he verbally charged with having contributed to the miscarriage of the expedition. This affair was referred to a committee : Sir John Ashby was examined : the house directed the earl to draw up the substance of his charge ; and these papers were afterwards delivered to a committee of the commons, at a conference by the lord-president, and the rest of the committee above : they were offered for the inspection of the commons, as they concerned some members of that house, by whom they might be informed more fully of the particulars they contained. At another conference, which the commons demanded, their committee declared, in the name of the house, that they had read and well considered the papers which their lordships had sent them, and which they now returned : that, finding Mr. Russell, one of their members, often mentioned in the said papers, they had unanimously resolved, that admiral Russell, in his command of the fleets during the last summer's expedition, had behaved with fidelity, courage, and conduct. The lords, irritated at this declaration, and disappointed in their resentment against Russell, desired a free conference between the committees of both houses ; the earl of Rochester told the commons, he was commanded by the house of lords to inform them, that their lordships looked on the late vote and proceedings of the lower house, in returning their papers, to be irregular and unparliamentary, as they had not communicated to their lordships the lights they had received, and the reasons on which their vote was founded : a paper to the same purport was delivered to colonel Granville, who promised to present it to the commons, and make a faithful report of what his lordship had said. Thus the conference ended, and the inquiry was discontinued.

10. The lower house seemed to be as much exasperated against the earl of Nottingham as the lords were incensed at Russell: a motion was made that his majesty should be advised to appoint such commissioners of the board of admiralty as were of known experience in maritime affairs. Although this was over-ruled, they voted an address to the king, praying, that for the future, all orders for the management of the fleet might pass through the hands of the said commissioners; a protest by implication against the conduct of the secretary. The consideration of ways and means was the next object that engrossed the attention of the lower house: they resolved that a rate of four shillings in the pound, for one year, should be charged on all lands, according to their yearly value; as also on all personal estates, and on all offices and employments of profit, other than military offices in the army or navy: the act founded on this resolution empowered the king to borrow money on the credit of it at seven per cent: they farther enabled him to raise £1,000,000 on the general credit of the exchequer, by granting annuities: they laid several new duties on a variety of imports: they renewed the last quarterly poll, providing, that in case it should not produce £300,000, the deficiencies might be made up by borrowing on the general credit of the exchequer: they continued the impositions on wine, vinegar, tobacco, and sugar for five years, and those on East-India goods for four years: they laid a new imposition of eight per cent. on the capital stock of the East-India company, estimated at £744,000; of one per cent. on the African; of five pounds on every share of the stock belonging to the Hudson's-Bay company; and they empowered his majesty to borrow £500,000 on these funds, which were expressly established for maintaining the war with vigor.<sup>6</sup>

11. The money-bills were retarded in the upper house by the arts of Halifax, Mulgrave, and other malcontents: they grafted a clause on the land-tax bill, importing that the lords should tax themselves: it was adopted by the majority, and the bill sent with this amendment to the commons, by whom it was unanimously rejected as a flagrant attempt on their privileges: they demanded a conference, in which they declared that the clause in question was a notorious encroachment on the right the commons possessed of regulating all matters relating to supplies granted by parliament. When this report was debated in the house of lords, the earl of Mulgrave displayed uncommon powers of eloquence and argument, in persuading the house, that by yielding to this claim of the commons, they would divest themselves of their true greatness, and nothing would remain but the name and shadow of a peer, which was but a pageant: notwithstanding all his oratory, the lords relinquished their clause, declaring, at the same time, that they had agreed to pass the bill without alteration merely in regard to the present urgent state of affairs; as being otherwise of opinion that they had a right to insist on their clause. A formal complaint being made in the house of commons against the pamphlet, entitled, 'King William and Queen Mary Conquerors,' as containing assertions of dangerous consequence to their majesties, to the liberty of the subject, and the peace of the kingdom; the licenser and printer were taken into custody: the book being examined, they resolved that it should be burned by the hands of the common hangman, and that the king should be moved to dismiss the licenser from his employment: the same sentence they pronounced on a pastoral letter of bishop Burnet, in which this notion of conquest had been at first asserted. The lords, in order to manifest their sentiments on the same subject, resolved, that such an assertion was highly injurious to their majesties, inconsistent with the principles on which the government was founded, and tending to the subversion of the rights of the people. Bohun, the licenser, was brought to the bar of the house, and discharged on his own petition, after having been reprimanded on his knees by the speaker.

12. Several members having complained that their servants had been kidnapped, and sent to serve as soldiers in Flanders, the house appointed a committee to inquire into the abuses committed by press-masters; and a suitable remonstrance was presented to the king, who expressed his indignation at this practice, and assured the house that the delinquents should be brought to exemplary punishment: understanding, however, in the sequel, that the methods taken by his majesty for preventing this abuse had not proved effectual, they resumed their inquiry, and proceeded with uncommon vigor on the information they received: a great number of persons who had been pressed were discharged by order of the house; and captain Winter, the chief undertaker of this method of recruiting the army, was carried by the sergeant before the lord chief justice, that he might be prosecuted according to law.

13. Before the heats occasioned by this unpopular expedient were allayed, the discontent of the nation was farther inflamed by complaints from Ireland, where lord Sidney was said to rule with despotic authority: these complaints were exhibited by Sir Francis Brewster, Sir William Gore, Sir John Macgill, lieutenant Stafford, Mr. Stone, and Mr. Kerne: they were examined at the bar of the house, and delivered an account of their grievances in writing: both houses concurred in this inquiry; which being finished, they severally presented addresses to the king. The lords observed, that there had been great abuses in disposing of the forfeited estates; that protections had been granted to the Irish not included in the articles of Limerick, so that protestants were deprived of the benefit of the law against them; that the quarters of the army had not been paid according to the provision made by parliament; that a mayor had been imposed on the city of Dublin for two years successively, contrary to the ancient privileges and charter; that several persons accused of murder had been executed without proof; and one Sweetman, the most guilty, discharged without prosecution. The commons spoke more freely in their address: they roundly explained the abuses and mismanagement of that government, by exposing the protestant subjects to the free quarter and violence of a licentious army; by recruiting the troops with Irish papists, who had been in open rebellion against his majesty; by granting protections to Irish Roman catholics, whereby the course of the law was stopped; by reversing outlawries for high treason, not comprehended in the articles of Limerick; by letting the forfeited estates at under value, to the prejudice of his majesty's revenue; by embezzling the stores left in the towns and garrisons by the late king James, as well as the effects belonging to the forfeited estates, which might have been employed for the better preservation of the kingdom; and, finally, by making additions to the articles of Limerick, after the capitulation was signed and the place surrendered: they most humbly besought his majesty to redress these abuses, which had greatly encouraged the papists, and weakened the protestant interest in Ireland. The king graciously received both addresses, and promised to pay a particular regard to all remonstrances that should come from either house of parliament ; but no material step was taken against the lords Sidney, Athlone, and Coningsby, who appeared to have engrossed great part of the forfeitures by grants from the crown ; and even commissioner Culliford, who had been guilty of the most grievous acts of oppression, escaped with impunity.

14. The old whig principle was not yet wholly expelled from the lower house : the undue influence of the court was exerted in such an open, scandalous manner, as gave offence to the majority of the commons. In the midst of all their condescension, Sir Edward Hussey, member for Lincoln, brought in a bill touching free and impartial proceedings in parliament : it was intended to disable all members of parliament from enjoying places of trust and profit, and particularly levelled against the officers of the army and navy, who had insinuated themselves into the house in such numbers, that this was commonly called the officers' parliament : the bill passed the house of commons, and was sent up to the lords, by whom it was read a second time, and committed ; but the ministry employing their whole strength against it, on the report it was thrown out by a majority of two voices : the earl of Mulgrave again distinguished himself by his elocution, in a speech that was held in great veneration by the people ; and, among those who entered a protest in the journals of the house, when the majority rejected the bill, was prince George of Denmark, duke of Cumberland. The court had not recollected themselves from the consternation produced by such a vigorous opposition, when the earl of Shrewsbury produced another bill for triennial parliaments, providing that there should be an annual session ; that if, at the expiration of three years, the crown should not order the writs to be issued, the lord chancellor, or keeper, or commissioner of the great seal, should issue them ex officio, and by authority of this act, under severe penalties. The immediate object of this bill was the dissolution of the present parliament, which had already sat three sessions, and began to be formidable to the people from its concessions to the ministry. The benefits that would accrue to the constitution from the establishment of triennial parliaments were very well understood, as these points had been frequently discussed in former reigns. The courtiers now objected, that frequent elections would render the freeholders proud and insolent, encourage faction among the electors, and entail a continued expense on the member; as he would find himself obliged, during the whole time of his sitting, to behave like a candidate, conscious how soon the time of election would revolve. In spite of the ministerial interest in the upper house, the bill passed, and contained a proviso that the present parliament should not continue any longer than the month of January next ensuing: the court renewed its efforts against it in the house of commons, where, nevertheless, it was carried, with some little alterations, which the lords approved: but all these endeavors were frustrated by the prerogative of the king, who, by refusing his assent, prevented its being enacted into a law.

15. It was at the instigation of the ministry that the commons brought in a bill for continuing and explaining certain temporary laws then expiring or expired: among these was an act for restraining the liberty of the press, which owed its original to the reign of Charles II. and had been revived in the first year of the succeeding reign: the bill passed the lower house without difficulty, but met with warm opposition in the house of lords, a good number of whom protested against it, as a law that subjected all learning and true information to the arbitrary will of a mercenary, and perhaps ignorant licenser, destroyed the properties of authors, and extended the evil of monopolies. The bill for regulating trials was dropped, and, in lieu of it, another produced for the preservation of their majesties' sacred persons and government; but this too was rejected by the majority, in consequence of the ministry's secret management [1693.]. The East-India company narrowly escaped dissolution: petitions and counter-petitions were delivered into the house of commons: the pretensions on both sides were carefully examined: a committee of the whole house resolved, that there should be a new subscription of a joint-stock, not exceeding £2,500,000, to continue for one-and-twenty years. The report was made and received, and the public expected to see the affair brought to a speedy issue; but the company had recourse to the same expedients which had lately proved so successful in the hands of the ministry: those who had been the most warm in detecting their abuses suddenly cooled; and the prosecution of the affair began to languish: not but that the house presented an address to his majesty, praying that he would dissolve the company on three years' warning, according to the condition of their charter; he told them he would consider their address; and they did not farther urge their remonstrance. The bill for ascertaining the commissions and salaries of the judges, to which the king had refused the royal assent in the last session, was revived, twice read, and rejected; and another, for preventing the exportation and melting of the coin, they suffered to lie neglected on the table. On the fourteenth of March, the king put an end to the session, after having thanked the parliament for so great testimonies of their affection, and promised the supplies should not be misapplied: he observed, that the posture of affairs called him abroad; but that he would leave a sufficient number of troops for the security of the kingdom: he assured them he would expose his person on all occasions for the advantage of these kingdoms; and use his utmost endeavors to make them a flourishing nation.<sup>7</sup>

16. During the course of this session, lord Mohun was indicted and tried by his peers in Westminster-hall, as an accomplice in the murder of one Montford, a celebrated comedian, the marquis of Carmathen acting as lord-steward on this occasion. The judges having been consulted, the peers proceeded to give their judgments seriatim, and Mohun was acquitted by a great majority: the king, who,

<sup>7</sup> The other laws made in this session were these that follow:— an act for preventing suits against such as had acted for their majesties' service in defence of this kingdom: an act for raising the militia in the year 1693: an act authorising the judges to empower such persons, other than common attorneys and solicitors, as they should think fit, to take special bail, except in London, Westminster, and ten miles round: an act to encourage the apprehending of highwaymen: an act for preventing clandestine marriages: an act for the regaining, encouraging, and settling the Greenland trade: an act to prevent malicious informations in the court of king's bench, and for the more easy reversal of outlawries in that court: an act for the better discovery of judgments in the courts of law: an act for delivering declarations to prisoners for debt: an act for regulating proceedings in the crown office: an act for the more easy discovery and conviction of such as should destroy the game of this kingdom: and an act for continuing the acts for prohibiting all trade and commerce with France, and for the encouragement of privateers.

from his first accession to the throne, had endeavored to trim the balance between the whigs and tories, by mingling them together in his ministry, made some alterations at this period that savored of the same policy. The great seal, with the title of lord keeper, was bestowed on Sir John Somers, who was well skilled in the law, as in many other branches of polite and useful literature: he possessed a remarkable talent for business, in which he exerted great patience and assiduity; was gentle, candid, and equitable; a whig in principles, yet moderate, pacific, and conciliating: of the same temper was Sir John Trenchard, now appointed secretary of state: he had been concerned with the duke of Monmouth, and escaped to the continent, where he lived some years; was calm, sedate, well acquainted with foreign affairs, and considered as a leading man in his party. These two are said to have been promoted at the recommendation of the earl of Sunderland, who had by this time insinuated himself into the king's favor and confidence; though his success confirmed the opinion which many entertained of his having betrayed his old master: the leaders of the opposition were Sir Edward Seymour, again become a malcontent; and Sir Christopher Musgrave, a gentleman of Cumberland, who, though an extravagant tory from principle, had refused to concur with all the designs of the late king: he was a person of a grave and regular deportment, who had rejected many offers of the ministry, which he opposed with great violence; yet on some critical occasions his patriotism gave way to his avarice, and he yielded up some important points, in consideration of large sums which he received from the court in secret.<sup>8</sup> Others declared war against the administration, because they thought their own talents were not sufficiently considered: of these the chief were Paul Foley and Robert Harley: the first was a lawyer of good capacity, extensive learning, and virtuous principles; but peevish, obstinate, and morose: he entertained a very despicable opinion of the court, and this he propagated with equal assiduity and success. Harley possessed a good fund of learning; was capable of uncommon application; particularly turned to politics: he knew the forms of parliament; had a peculiar dexterity at protracting and perplexing debates; and cherished the most aspiring ambition. Admiral Russell was created treasurer of the household; but the command of the fleet was vested in the hands of Killigrew, Delaval, and Shovel: Sir George Rooke was declared vice-admiral of the red, and John lord Berkley, of the blue division; their rear-admirals were Matthew Aylmer and David Mitchell.

17. The king having visited the fleet and fortifications at Portsmouth, given instructions for annoying the enemy by sea, and left the administration in the hands of the queen, embarked on the last day of March, near Gravesend, and arrived in Holland on the third of April: the troops of the confederates were forthwith ordered to assemble; but while he was employed in making preparations for the campaign, the French king actually took the field, attended by Madame de Maintenon, and all the court ladies: his design was supposed to be on some town in Brabant; his army amounted to 120,000 men, completely armed, and abundantly supplied with all necessaries for every sort of military operation. King William immediately took possession of the strong camp at Parke, near Louvain; a situation which enabled him to cover the places that were most exposed: understanding that the French emissaries had sown the seeds of dissension between the bishop and chapter of Liege, he sent the duke of Wirtemberg thither, to reconcile the different parties, and concert measures for the farther security of the place: he reinforced the garrison with nine battalions; and the elector palatine lay with his troops in readiness to march to its relief: William likewise threw reinforcements into Maestricht, Huy, and Charleroy; and he himself resolved to remain on the defensive, at the head of 60,000 men, with a numerous train of artillery.

18. Louis, having reviewed his army at Gemblours, and seen his designs on Brabant defeated by the diligence of his antagonist, detached Boufflers with 20,000 men to the Upper-Rhine, to join the dauphin, who commanded in that quarter; then, leaving the conduct of his forces in the Netherlands to the duke de Luxemburg, he returned with his court to Versailles. Immediately after his departure, Luxemburg fixed his head-quarters at Mildert; and king William strengthened his camp on that side with ten battalions and eight-and-twenty pieces of cannon: the enemy's convoys were frequently surprised by detachments from the garrison of Charleroy; and a large body of horse, foot, and dragoons, being drafted out of Liege and Maestricht, took post at Huy, under the command of the count de Tilly, so as to straiten the French in their quarters: these, however, were dislodged by Luxemburg in person, who obliged the count to pass the Jaar with precipitation, leaving behind three squadrons and all his baggage, which fell into the hands of the enemy: this check, however, was balanced by the success of the duke of Wirtemberg, who, at the head of thirteen battalions of infantry and twenty squadrons of horse, forced the French lines between the Scheldt and the Lys, and laid the whole country as far as Lisle under contribution. On that very day, which was the eighteenth of July, Luxemburg marched towards Huy, which was next morning invested by M. de Villeroi: the other covered the siege, and secured himself from the allies by lines of contravallation. Before the batteries began to play, the town capitulated: on the twenty-third of the month, the garrison mutinied; the castles were surrendered; the governor remained a prisoner; and his men were conducted to Liege: the confederate army advanced in order to relieve the town; but the king, being apprised of its fate, detached ten battalions to reinforce the garrison of Liege, and next day returned to Neer-Hespen.

19. Luxemburg made a motion towards Liege, as if he had intended to besiege the place; and encamped at Hellechem, about seven leagues from the confederates: knowing how much they were weakened by the different detachments which had been made from their army, he resolved to attack them in their camp, or at least fall on their rear, should they retreat at his approach: on the twenty-eighth of July, he began his march in four columns, and passed the Jaar near its source with an army superior to the allies by 35,000 men. The king of England, at first, looked on this motion as a feint to cover the design on Liege; but receiving intelligence that their whole army was in full march to attack him in his camp, he resolved to keep his ground, and immediately drew up his forces in order of battle: his general officers advised him to repass the Geete: but he chose to risk a battle, rather than expose the rear of his army in repassing that river. His right wing extended as far as Neer-Winden, along the Geete, covered with hedges, hollow ways, and a small rivulet; the left reached to Neer-Landen; and these two villages were joined by a slight intrenchment, which the king ordered to be thrown up in the evening. Brigadier Ramsey, with the regiments of O'Farrell, Mackay, Lauder, Leven, and Monroe, were ordered to the right of the whole army, to line some hedges and hollow ways on the farther side of the village of Lare: six battalions of Brandenburg were posted to the left of this village; and general Dumont, with the Hanoverian infantry, possessed the village of Neer-Winden, which covered part of the camp between the main body and the right wing of the cavalry: Neer-Landen, on the left, was secured by six battalions of English, Danes, and Dutch: the remaining infantry was drawn up in one line behind the intrenchment: the dragoons on the left guarded the village of Dormal on the brook of Beck; and from thence the left wing of horse extended to Neer-Landen, where it was covered by this rivulet.

20. The king, having visited all the posts on horseback, and given the necessary orders, reposed himself about two hours in his coach; and early in the morning sent for his chaplain, whom he joined in prayer with great devotion: at sun-rising the enemy appeared drawn up in order of battle; and the allies began to play their cannon with good success: about eight in the morning they attacked the villages of Lare and Neer-Winden with great fury; and twice made themselves masters of these posts, from whence they were as often repulsed: the allies still kept their ground; and the duke of Berwick was taken by his uncle brigadier Churchill. Then the French made an attack on the left wing of the confederates at Neer-Landen; and, after a very obstinate dispute, were obliged to give way, though they still kept possession of the avenues: the prince of Conti, however, renewed the charge with the flower of the French infantry; and the confederates being overpowered, retreated from the village, leaving the camp in that part exposed. Villeroy, marching this way with a body of horse, was encountered and repulsed by the count D'Arco, general of the Bavarian cuirassiers; and the duke de Chartres narrowly escaped being taken. Meanwhile, Luxemburg, the prince of Conti, the count de Marsin, and the marshal de Joyeuse charged on the right and in different parts of the line with such impetuosity as surmounted all resistance: the camp of the confederates was immediately filled with French troops; the villages of Lare and Neer-Winden were taken, after a long and desperate dispute. The Hanoverian and Dutch horse being broken, the king in person brought the English cavalry to their assistance: they fought with great gallantry; and for some time retarded the fate of the day: the infantry were rallied, and stood firm until all their ammunition was expended: in a word, they were scarce able to sustain the weight of such a superiority in point of number, when the marquis D'Harcourt joined the enemy from Huy, with two-and-twenty fresh squadrons, which immediately turned the scale in their favor: the elector of Bavaria, after having made extraordinary efforts, retreated with great difficulty over the bridge to the other side of the river, where he rallied the troops, in order to favor the retreat of those who had not passed. The king, seeing the battle lost and the whole army in confusion, retired with the infantry to Dormal on the brook of Beck, where the dragoons of the left wing were posted; and then ordered the regiments of Wyndham, Lumley, and Galway to cover his retreat over the bridge at Neer-Hespen, which he effected with great difficulty: now all was tumult, rout, and consternation; and a great number of the fugitives threw themselves into the river, where they were drowned: this had like to have been the fate of the brave earl of Athlone; the duke of Ormond was wounded in several places, and taken prisoner by the enemy; and the count de Solmes was mortally wounded. Ptolemache brought off the greater part of the English infantry with great gallantry and conduct; as for the baggage, it had been sent to Liege before the engagement; but the confederates lost sixty pieces of cannon, and nine mortars, a great number of standards and colors,<sup>9</sup> with about 7000 men killed and wounded in the action: it must be owned that the allies fought with great valor and perseverance, and that king William made prodigious efforts of courage and activity to retrieve the fortune of the day: he was present in all parts of the battle; he charged in person both on horseback and on foot, where the danger was most imminent: his peruke, the sleeve of his coat, and the knot of his scarf were penetrated by three different musket-bullets, and he saw a great number of soldiers fall on every side of him: the enemy bore witness to his extraordinary valor. The prince of Conti, in a letter to his princess, which was intercepted, declared that he saw the prince of Orange exposing himself to the greatest dangers; and that such valor richly deserved the peaceable possession of the crown he wore : yet, here, as in every other battle he fought, his conduct and disposition were severely censured. Luxemburg, having observed the nature of his situation immediately before the engagement, is said to have exclaimed, 'Now I believe Waldeck is really dead ;' alluding to that general's known sagacity in choosing ground for an encampment. Be that as it will, he paid dear for his victory : his loss in officers and men exceeded that of the allies ; and he reaped no solid advantage from the battle : he remained fifteen days inactive at Waren, while king William, recalling the duke of Wirtemberg, and drafting troops from Liege and other garrisons, was in a few days able to hazard another engagement.

21. Nothing remarkable happened during the remaining part of the campaign, until Luxemburg, being rejoined by Boufflers with a strong reinforcement from the Rhine, invested Charleroy : he had taken his measures with such caution and dexterity, that the allies could not frustrate his operations without attacking his lines at a great disadvantage. The king detached the elector of Bavaria and the duke of Wirtemberg, with thirty battalions and forty squadrons, to make a diversion in Flanders ; but they returned in a few days, without having attempted any thing of consequence. The garrison of Charleroy defended the place with surprising valor from the tenth of September to the eleventh of October, during which period they had repulsed the assailants in several attacks ; but, at length, despairing of relief, the governor capitulated on the most honorable conditions : the reduction of the place was celebrated with a Te Deum and other rejoicings at Paris. Louis, however, in the midst of all his glory, was extremely mortified when he reflected on the little advantage he had reaped from all his late victories : the allies had been defeated successively at Fleurus, Steenkirk, and Landen ; yet in a fortnight after each of those battles, William was always in a condition to risk another engagement : formerly, Louis had conquered half of Holland, Flanders, and Franche-Comté, without a battle ; whereas, now he could not, with his utmost efforts, and after the most signal victories, pass the frontiers of the United Provinces. The conquest of Charleroy concluded the campaign in the Netherlands, and both armies went into winter quarters.

22. The French army on the Rhine, under de Lorges, passed that river in the month of May at Philipsburg, and invested the city of Heidelberg, which they took, plundered, and reduced to ashes: this general committed numberless barbarities in the palatinate, which he ravaged, without even sparing the tombs of the dead: the French soldiers on this occasion seem to have been actuated by the most brutal inhumanity: they butchered the inhabitants, violated the women, plundered the houses, rifled the churches, and murdered the priests at the altar: they broke open the electoral vault, and scattered the ashes of that illustrious family about the streets: they set fire to different quarters of the city; they stripped about 15,000 of the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex; and drove them naked into the castle, that the garrison might be the sooner induced to capitulate: there they remained like cattle in the open air, without food or covering, tortured between the horrors of their fate and the terrors of a bombardment: when they were set at liberty, in consequence of the fort's being surrendered, a great number of them died along the banks of the Neckar, from cold, hunger, anguish, and despair. These enormous cruelties, which would have disgraced the arms of a Tartarian freebooter, were acted by the express command of Louis XIV. of France, who has been celebrated by so many venal pens, not only as the greatest monarch, but also as the most polished prince of Christendom. De Lorges advanced towards the Neckar against the prince of Baden, who lay encamped on the other side of the river; but in attempting to pass he was twice repulsed with considerable damage. The dauphin joining the army, which now amounted to 70,000 men, crossed without opposition; but found the Germans so advantageously posted, that he would not hazard an attack: having, therefore, repassed the river, he secured Stutgard with a garrison, sent detachments into Flanders and Piedmont, and returned in August to Versailles. In Piedmont the allies were still more unfortunate: the duke of Savoy and his confederates seemed bent on driving the French from Casal and Pignerol: the first of these places was blocked up, and the other actually invested: the fort of St. Bridget, that covered the place, was taken, and the town bombarded. Meanwhile Catinat, being reinforced, descended into the plains: the duke was so apprehensive of Turin, that he abandoned the siege of Pignerol, after having blown up the fort; and marched in quest of the enemy to the plain of Marsaglia, in the neighborhood of his capital. On the fourth of October, the French advanced on them from the hills, between Orbasson and Prosasque; and a desperate engagement ensued: the enemy charged the left wing of the confederates sword in hand with incredible fury: though they were once repulsed, they renewed the attack with such impetuosity, that the Neapolitan and Milanese horse were obliged to give way, and disordered the German cavalry: these falling on the foot, threw the whole wing into confusion: meanwhile, the main body and the other wing sustained the charge without flinching, until they were exposed in flank by the defeat of the cavalry; then the whole front gave way: in vain the second line was brought up to sustain them; the horse turned their backs, and the infantry was totally routed: in a word, the confederates were obliged to retire with precipitation, leaving their cannon, and about 8000 men killed or wounded on the field of battle. The duke of Schomberg, having been denied the post which was his due, insisted on fighting at the head of the troops maintained by the king of Great Britain, who were posted in the centre, and behaved with great gallantry under the eye of their commander: when the left wing was defeated, the count de los Torres desired he would take on him the command, and retreat with the infantry and the right wing; but he refused to act without the order of his highness; and said, things were come to such a pass, that they must either conquer or die: he continued to animate his men with his voice and example, until he received a shot in the thigh: his valet, seeing him fall, ran to his assistance, and called for quarter; but was killed by the enemy before he could be understood: the duke being taken at the same instant, was afterwards dismissed on his parole, and in a few days died at Turin, universally lamented on account of his great and amiable qualities: the earl of Warwick and Holland, who accompanied him as a volunteer, shared his fate in being wounded and taken prisoner; but he soon recovered his health and liberty. This victory was as unsubstantial as that of Landen, and almost as dear in the purchase; for the confederates made an obstinate defence, and yielded solely to superior number: the duke of Savoy retreated to Moncallier, and threw a reinforcement into Coni, which Catinat would not venture to besiege, so severely had he been handled in the battle: he therefore contented himself with laying the country under contribution, reinforcing the garrisons of Casal, Pignerol, and Susa, and making preparations for repassing the mountains. The news of this victory no sooner reached Paris, than Louis despatched M. de Chanlais to Turin, with proposals for detaching the duke of Savoy from the interest of the allies; and the pope, who was now become a partisan of France, supported the negociation with his whole influence: but the French king had not yet touched on the right string: the duke continued deaf to all his addresses.

23. France had been alike successful in her intrigues at the courts of Rome and Constantinople: the visir at the Porte had been converted into a pensionary and creature of Louis; but the war in which the Turks had been so long and unsuccessfully engaged rendered him so odious to the people, that the grand signor deposed him, in order to appease their clamors: the English and Dutch ambassadors at Constantinople forthwith renewed their mediation for a peace with the emperor; but the terms they proposed were still rejected with disdain: in the mean time general Heusler, who commanded the imperialists in Transylvania, reduced the fortresses of Jenö and Villáguswar. In the beginning of July the duc de Croy assumed the chief command of the German army, passed the Danube and the Saave, and invested Belgrade: the siege was carried on for some time with great vigor; but at length abandoned at the reproach of the visir, who obliged the imperialists to repass the Saave, and sent out parties which made incursions into Upper Hungary. The power of France had never been so conspicuous as at this juncture, when she maintained a formidable navy at sea, and four great armies in different parts of Europe: exclusive of the operations in Flanders, Germany, and Piedmont, the count de Noailles invested Roses in Catalonia about the latter end of May; while at the same time it was blocked up by the French fleet, under the command of the count d'Etrées: in a few days the place was surrendered by capitulation, and the castle of Ampurias met with the same fate. The Spanish power was reduced to such a degree, that Noailles might have proceeded in his conquests without interruption, had he not been obliged to detach part of his army to reinforce Catinat in Piedmont.

24. Nothing could be more inglorious for the English than their operations by sea in the course of this summer. The king had ordered the admiral to use all possible despatch in equipping the fleets, that they might block up the enemy in their own ports, and protect the commerce which had suffered severely from the French privateers: they were, however, so dilatory in their proceedings, that the squadrons of the enemy sailed from their harbors before the English fleet could put to sea. About the middle of May it was assembled at St. Helens, and took on board five regiments, intended for a descent on Brest; but this enterprise was never attempted: when the English and Dutch squadrons joined so as to form a very numerous fleet, the public expected they would undertake some expedition of importance; but the admirals were divided in opinion, nor did their orders warrant their executing any scheme of consequence: Killegrew and Delaval did not escape the suspicion of being disaffected to the service; and France was said to have maintained a secret correspondence with the malcontents in England. Louis had made surprising efforts to repair the damage which his navy had sustained: he had purchased several large vessels, and converted them into ships of war; he had laid an embargo on all the shipping of his kingdom until his squadrons were manned; he had made a grand naval promotion to encourage the officers and seamen; and this expedient produced a wonderful spirit of activity and emulation: in the month of May his fleet sailed to the Mediterranean in three squadrons, consisting of seventy-one capital ships, besides bomb-ketches, fire-ships, and tenders.

25. In the beginning of June the English and Dutch fleets sailed down the channel: on the sixth, Sir George Rooke was detached to the Straits with a squadron of three-and-twenty ships, as convoy to the Mediterranean trade: the grand fleet returned to Torbay, while he pursued his voyage, having under his protection about 400 merchant ships belonging to England, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Hamburg, and Flanders: on the sixteenth, his scouts discovered part of the French fleet under Cape St. Vincent; next day their whole navy appeared, to the amount of eighty sail: sixteen of these plied up to the English squadron, while the vice-admiral of the white stood off to sea, to intercept the ships under convoy. Sir George Rooke, by the advice of the Dutch vice-admiral, Vandergoes, resolved, if possible, to avoid an engagement, which could only tend to their absolute ruin: he forthwith sent orders to the small ships that were near the land to put into the neighboring ports of Faro, St. Lucar, and Cadiz, while he himself stood off with an easy sail for the protection of the rest: about six in the evening ten sail of the enemy came up with two Dutch ships of war, commanded by the captains Schrijver and Vander-Poel, who seeing no possibility of escaping, tacked in shore; and, thus drawing the French after them, helped to save the rest of the fleet: when attacked, they made a most desperate defence; but at last were overpowered by numbers, and taken: an English ship of war and a rich pinnace were burned; nine-and-twenty merchant vessels were taken, and about fifty destroyed by the counts de Tourville and D'Etrées: seven of the largest Smyrna ships fell into the hands of M. de Coetlegon, and four he sunk in the bay of Gibraltar: the value of the loss sustained on this occasion amounted to £1,000,000 sterling. Meanwhile Rooke stood off with a fresh gale, and on the nineteenth sent home the Lark ship of war with the news of his misfortune; then he bore away for the Madeiras, where having taken in wood and water, he set sail for Ireland, and on the third of August arrived at Cork, with fifty sail, including ships of war and trading vessels: he detached captain Fairborne to Kinsale, with all his squadron, except six ships of the line, with which, in pursuance of orders, he joined the great fleet then cruising in the chops of the channel: on the twenty-fifth of August, they returned to St. Helens, and the four regiments were landed: on the nineteenth of September, fifteen Dutch ships of the line and two frigates set sail for Holland; and twenty-six sail, with seven fire-ships, were assigned as guard-ships during the winter.

26. The French admirals, instead of pursuing Rooke to Madeira, made an unsuccessful attempt on Cadiz, and bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants sunk their ships that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy: then they sailed along the coast of Spain; destroyed some English and Dutch vessels at Malaga, Alicant, and other places; and returned in triumph to Toulon. About this period, Sir Francis Wheeler returned to England with his squadron from an unfortunate expedition in the West-Indies: in conjunction with colonel Codrington, governor of the Leeward Islands, he made unsuccessful attempts on the islands of Martinique and Dominique: then he sailed to Boston in New England, with a view to concert an expedition against Quebec, which was judged impracticable: he afterwards steered for Placentia in Newfoundland, which he would have attacked without hesitation, but the design was rejected by a majority of voices in the council of war : thus disappointed, he set sail for England ; and arrived at Portsmouth in a very shattered condition, the greater part of his men having died in the course of this voyage.

27. In November another effort was made to annoy the enemy. Commodore Benbow sailed with a squadron of twelve capital ships, four bomb-ketches, and ten brigantines, to the coast of St. Maloes ; and anchoring within half a mile of the town, cannonaded and bombarded it for three days successively : then his men landed on an island, where they burned a convent : on the nineteenth they took the advantage of a dark night, a fresh gale, and a strong tide, to send in a fire-ship of a particular contrivance, styled the Infernal, in order to burn the town ; but she struck on a rock before she arrived at the place, and the engineer was obliged to set her on fire, and retreat : she continued burning for some time, and at last blew up with such an explosion, as shook the whole town like an earthquake, unroofed 300 houses, and broke all the glass and earthenware for three leagues around : a capstan that weighed 200 lbs. was transported into the place, and falling on a house, levelled it to the ground ; the greatest part of the wall towards the sea tumbled down ; and the inhabitants were overwhelmed with consternation ; so that a small number of troops might have taken possession without resistance, but there was not a soldier on board : nevertheless, the sailors took and demolished Quince-fort, and did considerable damage to the town of St. Maloes, which had been a nest of privateers that infested the English commerce. Though this attempt was executed with great spirit and some success, the clamors of the people became louder and louder : they scrupled not to say, that the councils of the nation were betrayed ; and their suspicions rose even to the secretary's office : they observed that the French were previously acquainted with all the motions of the English, and took their measures accordingly for their destruction : they collected and compared a good number of particulars that seemed to justify their suspicion of treachery : but the misfortunes of the nation, in all probability, arose from a motley ministry divided among themselves, who, instead of acting in concert for the public good, employed all their influence to thwart the views and blacken the reputations of each other. The people in general exclaimed against the marquis of Carmarthen, and the earls of Nottingham and Rochester, who had acquired great credit with the queen, and, from their hatred to the whigs, betrayed the interests of the nation.

28. But if the English were discontented, the French were miserable, in spite of all their victories: that kingdom labored under a dreadful famine, occasioned partly from unfavorable seasons, and partly from the war, which had not left hands sufficient to cultivate the ground: notwithstanding all the diligence and providence of their ministry in bringing supplies of corn from Sweden and Denmark, their care in regulating the price and furnishing the markets, their liberal contributions for the relief of the indigent; multitudes perished of want, and the whole kingdom was reduced to poverty and distress. Louis pined in the midst of his success: he saw his subjects exhausted by a ruinous war, in which they had been involved by his ambition: he tampered with the allies apart, in hopes of dividing and detaching them from the grand confederacy: he solicited the northern crowns to engage as mediators for a general peace: a memorial was actually presented by the Danish minister to king William, by which it appears that the French king would have been contented to purchase a peace with some considerable concessions; but the terms were rejected by the king of England, whose ambition and revenge were not yet gratified; and whose subjects, though heavily laden, could still bear additional burdens.

29. The Jacobites had been very attentive to the progress of dissatisfaction in England, which they fomented with their usual assiduity. The late declaration of king James had been couched in such imperious terms as gave offence even to some of those who favored his interest: the earl of Middleton, therefore, in the beginning of the year repaired to St. Germain, and obtained another which contained the promise of a general pardon without exception, and every other concession that a British subject could demand of his sovereign. About the latter end of May, two men, named Canning and Dormer, were apprehended for dispersing copies of this paper; tried at the Old-Bailey; found guilty, of not only dispersing, but also of composing a false and seditious libel; sentenced to pay 500 marks apiece, to stand three times in the pillory, and find sureties for their good behavior: but no circumstance reflected more disgrace on this reign than the fate of Anderton, the supposed printer of some tracts against the government: he was brought to trial for high treason: he made a vigorous defence, in spite of the insults and discouragement he sustained from a partial bench : as nothing but presumptions appeared against him, the jury scrupled to bring in a verdict that would affect his life, until they were reviled and reprimanded by judge Treby ; then they found him guilty : in vain recourse was had to the queen's mercy ; he suffered death at Tyburn ; and left a paper, protesting solemnly against the proceedings of the court, which he affirmed was appointed, not to try, but to convict him ; and petitioning Heaven to forgive his penitent jury. The severity of the government was likewise exemplified in the case of some adventurers, who having equipped privateers to cruise on the English, under joint commissions from the late king James and Louis XIV. happened to be taken by the English ships of war : Dr. Oldys, the king's advocate, being commanded to proceed against them as guilty of treason and piracy, refused to commence the prosecution ; and gave his opinion in writing, that they were neither traitors nor pirates : he supported this opinion by arguments before the council : these were answered by Dr. Littleton, who succeeded him in the office from which he was dismissed ; and the prisoners were executed as traitors. The Jacobites did not fail to retort those arts on the government, which their adversaries had so successfully practised in the late reign : they inveighed against the vindictive spirit of the administration, and taxed it with encouraging informers and false witnesses ; a charge for which there was too much foundation.

30. The friends of James in Scotland still continued to concert designs in his favor ; but their correspondence was detected, and their aims defeated, by the vigilance of the ministry in that kingdom : secretary Johnston not only kept a watchful eye over all their transactions ; but by a dexterous management of court liberality and favor appeased the contents of the presbyterians so effectually, that the king ran no risk in assembling the parliament : some offices were bestowed on the leaders of the kirk party ; and the duke of Hamilton being reconciled to the government, was appointed commissioner. On the eighteenth of April the session was opened ; and the king's letter, replete with the most cajoling expressions, being read, the parliament proceeded to exhibit undeniable specimens of their good humor : they drew up a very affectionate answer to his majesty's letter ; they voted an addition of six new regiments to the standing forces of the kingdom ; they granted a supply of above £150,000

sterling to his majesty ; they enacted a law for levying men to serve on board the royal navy ; they fined all absentees, whether lords or commons ; and vacated the seats of all those commissioners who refused to take the oath of assurance, which was equivalent to an abjuration of king James ; they set on foot an inquiry about an intended invasion ; they published some intercepted letters, supposed to be written to king James by Neville Payne, whom they committed to prison, and threatened with a trial for high treason ; but he eluded the danger, by threatening in his turn to impeach those who had made their peace with the government ; they passed an act for the comprehension of such of the episcopal clergy as should condescend to take the oaths by the tenth of July. All that the general assembly required of them, was an offer to subscribe the confession of faith, and to acknowledge presbytery as the only government of the Scottish church ; but they neither submitted to these terms, nor took the oaths within the limited time ; so that they forfeited all legal right to their benefices : nevertheless, they continued in possession, and even received private assurances of the king's protection. It was one of William's political maxims, to court his domestic enemies ; but it was never attended with any good effect : this indulgence gave offence to the presbyterians, and former distractions began to revive.

31. The king having prevailed on the States-General to augment their land forces and navy for the service of the ensuing campaign, embarked for England, and arrived at Kensington on the thirtieth of October : finding the people clamorous and discontented, the trade of the nation decayed, the affairs of state mismanaged, and the ministers recriminating on one another, he perceived the necessity of changing hands, and resolved to take his measures accordingly. Sunderland, his chief counsellor, represented that the tories were averse to the continuance of a war, which had been productive of nothing but damage and disgrace ; whereas the whigs were much more tractable, and would bleed freely, partly from the terrors of invasion and popery, partly from the ambition of being courted by the crown, and partly from the prospect of advantage, in advancing money to the government on the funds established by parliament ; for that sort of traffic, which obtained the appellation of the moneyed interest, was altogether a whigish institution. The king revolved these observations in his own mind ; and, in the mean time, the parliament met on the seventh of November, pursuant to the last prorogation. In his speech he expressed his resentment against those who were the authors of the miscarriages at sea ; represented the necessity of increasing the land forces and the navy ; and demanded a suitable supply for these purposes : in order to pave the way to their condescension, he had already dismissed from his council the earl of Nottingham, who, of all his ministers, was the most odious to the people : his place would have been immediately filled with the earl of Shrewsbury ; but that nobleman, suspecting this was a change of men rather than of measures, stood aloof for some time, until he received such assurances from the king as quieted his scruples, and then he accepted the office of secretary : the lieutenancy for the city of London, and all other commissions over England, were altered with a view to favor the whig interest ; and the individuals of that party were indulged with many places of trust and profit : but the tories were too powerful in the house of commons to be exasperated, and therefore a good number of them were retained in office.

32. On the sixth day of the session, the commons unanimously resolved to support their majesties and their government, to inquire into miscarriages, and to consider of means for preserving the trade of the nation : the Turkey company were summoned to produce the petitions they had delivered to the commissioners of the admiralty for convoy : lord Falkland, who sat at the head of that board, gave in copies of all the orders and directions sent to Sir George Rooke concerning the Straits fleet, together with a list of all the ships at that time in commission. It appeared, in the course of this inquiry, that the miscarriage of Rooke's fleet was in a great measure owing to the misconduct of the admirals, and neglect of the victualling-office ; but they were screened by a majority. Mr. Harley, one of the commissioners for taking and stating the public accounts, delivered a report, which contained a charge of peculation against lord Falkland : Rainsford, receiver of the rights and perquisites of the navy, confessed that he had received and paid more money than that which was charged in the accounts ; and, in particular, that he had paid £4000 to lord Falkland by his majesty's order : this lord had acknowledged before the commissioners that he had paid one half of the sum, by the king's order, to a person who was not a member of either house; and that the remainder was still in his hands: Rainsford owned he had the original letter which he received from Falkland, demanding the money; and this nobleman desiring to see it, detained the voucher;—a circumstance that incensed the commons to such a degree, that a motion was made for committing him to the Tower, and debated with great warmth, but at last over-ruled by the majority: nevertheless, they agreed to make him sensible of their displeasure, and he was reprimanded in his place. The house of lords having also inquired into the causes of the miscarriages at sea, very violent debates arose; and at length the majority resolved that the admirals had done well in the execution of the orders they had received: this was a triumph over the whig lords, who had so eagerly prosecuted the affair, and now protested against the resolution, not without great appearance of reason. The next step of the lords was to exculpate the earl of Nottingham, as the blame seemed to lie with him, on the supposition that the admirals were innocent: with a view therefore to transfer this blame to Trenchard, the whiggish secretary, the earl gave the house to understand that he had received intelligence from Paris in the beginning of June, containing a list of the enemies' fleet, and the time of their sailing; that this was communicated to a committee of the council, and particularly imparted to secretary Trenchard, whose province it was to transmit instructions to the admirals. Two conferences passed on this subject between the lords and commons: Trenchard delivered in his defence in writing; and was in his turn screened by the whole efforts of the ministry, in which the whig influence now predominated. Thus an inquiry of such national consequence, which took its rise from the king's own expression of resentment against the delinquents, was stifled by the arts of the court, because it was likely to affect one of its creatures; for though there was no premeditated treachery in the case, the interest of the public was certainly sacrificed to the mutual animosity of the ministers. The charge of lord Falkland being resumed in the house of commons, he appeared to have begged and received of the king the remaining £2000 of the money which had been paid by Rainsford: he was therefore declared guilty of a high misdemeanor and breach of trust, and committed to the Tower; from whence, however, he was in two days discharged on his petition.

33. Harley, Foley, and Harcourt presented to the house

a state of the receipts and issues of the revenue, together with two reports from the commissioners of accounts concerning sums issued for secret services, and to members of parliament: this was a discovery of the most scandalous practices in the mystery of corruption, equally exercised on the individuals of both parties, in occasional bounties, grants, places, pensions, equivalents, and additional salaries: the malcontents, therefore, justly observed the house of commons was so managed, that the king could baffle any bill, quash all grievances, stifle accounts, and rectify the articles of Limerick. When the commons took into consideration the estimates and supplies of the ensuing year, the king demanded 40,000 men for the navy, and above 100,000 for the purposes of the land-service. Before the house considered these enormous demands, they granted £400,000 by way of advance, to quiet the clamors of the seamen who were become mutinous and desperate for want of pay, upwards of £1,000,000 being due to them for wages: then the commons voted the number of men required for the navy; but they were so ashamed of that for the army, that they thought it necessary to act in such a manner, as should imply that they still retained some regard for their country: they called for all the treaties subsisting between the king and his allies: they examined the different proportions of the troops furnished by the respective powers: they considered the intended augmentations, and fixed the establishment of the year at 83,121 men, including officers: for the maintenance of these they allotted the sum of £2,530,590: they granted £2,000,000 for the navy, and about £500,000 to make good the deficiencies of the annuity and poll-bills; so that the supplies of the year amounted to about £5,500,000, raised by a land-tax of four shillings in the pound, by two more lives in the annuities, a farther excise on beer, a new duty on salt, and a lottery.

34. Though the malcontents in parliament could not withstand this torrent of profusion, they endeavored to distress the court-interest by reviving the popular bills of the preceding session; such as that for regulating trials in cases of high treason, the other for the more frequent calling and meeting of parliaments, and that concerning free and impartial proceedings in parliament: the first was neglected in the house of lords; the second was rejected; the third was passed by the commons, on the supposition that it would be defeated in the other house: the lords returned it with certain amendments, to which the commons would not agree: a conference ensued; the peers receded from their corrections, and passed the bill, to which the king however refused his assent. Nothing could be more unpopular and dangerous than such a step at this juncture: the commons, in order to recover some credit with the people, determined to disapprove of his majesty's conduct: the house formed itself into a committee, to take the state of the kingdom into consideration: they resolved that whoever advised the king to refuse the royal assent to that bill was an enemy to their majesties and the kingdom: they likewise presented an address, expressing their concern that he had not given his consent to the bill, and beseeching his majesty to hearken for the future to the advice of his parliament rather than to the councils of particular persons, who might have private interests of their own, separate from those of his majesty and his people. The king thanked them for their zeal, professed a warm regard for their constitution, and assured them he would look on all parties as enemies who should endeavor to lessen the confidence subsisting between the sovereign and people. The members in the opposition were not at all satisfied with this general reply: a day being appointed to take it into consideration, a warm debate was maintained with equal eloquence and acrimony: at length, the question being put that an address should be made for a more explicit answer, it passed in the negative by a great majority.

35. The city of London petitioned that a parliamentary provision might be made for the orphans, whose fortunes they had scandalously squandered away: such an application had been made in the preceding session, and rejected with disdain, as an imposition on the public; but now those scruples were removed, and the house passed a bill for this purpose, consisting of many clauses, extending to different charges on the city lands, aqueducts, and personal estates; imposing duties on binding apprentices, constituting freemen, as also on wines and coals imported into London: on the twenty-third of March these bills received the royal assent; and the king took that opportunity of recommending despatch, as the season of the year was far advanced, and the enemy diligently employed in making preparations for an early campaign. The scheme of a national bank, like those of Amsterdam and Genoa, had been recommended to the ministry, as an excellent institution, as well for the credit and security of the government, as for the increase of trade and circulation: one project was invented by Dr. Hugh Chamberlain, proposing the circulation of tickets on land security; but William Paterson was author of that which was carried into execution by the interest of Michael Godfrey, and other active projectors: the scheme was founded on the notion of a transferable fund, and a circulation by bill on the credit of a large capital: forty merchants subscribed to the amount of £500,000, as a fund of ready money, to circulate £1,000,000 at eight per cent. to be lent to the government; and even this fund of ready money bore the same interest. When it was properly digested in the cabinet, and a majority in parliament secured for its reception, the undertakers for the court introduced it into the house of commons, and expatiated on the national advantages that would accrue from such a measure: they said it would rescue the nation out of the hands of extortioners and usurers, lower interest, raise the value of land, revive and establish public credit, extend circulation, consequently improve commerce, facilitate the annual supplies, and connect the people the more closely with the government: the project was violently opposed by a strong party, who affirmed that it would become a monopoly, and engross the whole money of the kingdom; that, as it must infallibly be subservient to government views, it might be employed to the worst purposes of arbitrary power; that, instead of assisting, it would weaken commerce, by tempting people to withdraw their money from trade, and employ it in stock-jobbing; that it would produce a swarm of brokers and jobbers to prey on their fellow-creatures, encourage fraud and gaming, and farther corrupt the morals of the nation. Notwithstanding these objections, the bill made its way through the two houses, establishing the funds for the security and advantage of the subscribers; empowering their majesties to incorporate them by the name of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, under a proviso, that at any time after the first day of August, in the year 1705, on a year's notice, and the repayment of the £1,200,000, the said corporation should cease and determine: the bill likewise contained clauses of appropriation for the service of the public. The whole subscription was filled in ten days after its being opened; and the court of directors completed the payment before the expiration of the time prescribed by the act, although they did not call in more than £720,000 of the money subscribed. All these funds proving inadequate to the estimates, the commons brought in a bill to impose stamp duties on all vellum, parchment, and paper, used in almost every kind of intercourse between man and man; and they crowned the oppressions of the year with another grievous tax on carriages, under the name of a bill for licensing and regulating hackney and stage-coaches.

36. The commons, in a clause of the bill for taxing several joint-stocks, provided, that in case of a default in the payment of that tax within the time limited by the act, the charter of the company so failing should be deemed void and forfeited: the East-India company actually neglected their payment, and the public imagined the ministry would seize this opportunity of dissolving a monopoly against which so many complaints had been made; but the directors understood their own strength; and, instead of being broken, obtained the promise of a new charter: this was no sooner known, than the controversy between them and their adversaries was revived with such animosity, that the council thought proper to indulge both parties with a hearing: as this produced no resolution, the merchants who opposed the company petitioned, that in the meanwhile, the new charter might be suspended: addresses of the same kind were presented by a great number of clothiers, linen-drappers, and other dealers: to these a written answer was published by the company; the merchants printed a reply, in which they undertook to prove that the company had been guilty of unjust and unwarrantable actions, tending to the scandal of religion, the dishonor of the nation, the reproach of our laws, the oppression of the people, and the ruin of trade. They observed, that two private ships had exported in one year three times as many cloths as the company had exported in three years: they offered to send more cloth and English merchandise to the Indies in one year than the company had exported in five; to furnish the government with 500 tons of saltpetre for less than one half of the usual price; and they represented, that the company could neither lade the ships they petitioned for in England, nor relade them in the East Indies. In spite of all these remonstrances, the new charter passed the great seal; though the grants contained in it were limited in such a manner, that they did not amount to an exclusive privilege, and subjected the company to such alterations, restrictions, and qualifications as the king should direct before the twenty-ninth of

September. This indulgence and other favors granted to the company were privately purchased of the ministry, and became productive of a loud outcry against the government: the merchants published a journal of the whole transaction, and petitioned the house of commons that their liberty of trading to the East-Indies might be confirmed by parliament: another petition was presented by the company, praying that their charter might receive a parliamentary sanction: both parties employed all their address in making private application to the members. The house, having examined the different charters, the book of their new subscriptions, and every particular relating to the company, resolved that all the subjects of England had an equal right to trade to the East-Indies, unless prohibited by act of parliament.

37. But nothing engrossed the attention of the public more than a bill which was brought into the house for a general naturalisation of all foreign protestants: the advocates for this measure alleged, that great part of the lands of England lay uncultivated; that the strength of a nation consisted in the number of inhabitants; that the people were thinned by the war and foreign voyages, and required an extraordinary supply; that a great number of protestants, persecuted in France and other countries, would gladly remove to a land of freedom, and bring along with them their wealth and manufactures; that the community had been largely repaid for the protection granted to those refugees who had already settled in the kingdom; they had introduced several new branches of manufacture, promoted industry, and lowered the price of labor; a circumstance of the utmost importance to trade, oppressed as it was with taxes, and exposed to uncommon hazard from the enemy. The opponents of the bill urged, with great vehemence, that it would cheapen the birthright of Englishmen; that the want of culture was owing to the oppression of the times; that foreigners, being admitted into the privileges of the British trade, would grow wealthy at the expense of their benefactors, and transfer the fortunes they had gained into their native country; that the reduction in the price of labor would be a national grievance, while many thousands of English manufacturers were starving for want of employment, and the price of provisions continued so high, that even those who were employed could scarce supply their families with bread; that the real design of the bill was to make such an accession to the dissenters as would render them an equal match in the body-politic for those of the church of England ; to create a greater dependence on the crown ; and, in a word, to supply a foreign head with foreign members. Sir John Knight, a member of the house, in a speech on this subject, exaggerated the bad consequences that would attend such a bill with all the wit and virulence of satire ; it was printed and dispersed through the kingdom ; and raised such a flame among the people, as had not appeared since the revolution. They exclaimed, that all offices would be conferred on Dutchmen, who would become lord-danes, and prescribe the modes of religion and government ; and they extolled Sir John Knight as the savior of the nation. The courtiers, incensed at the progress of this clamor, complained in the house of the speech which had been printed ; and Sir John was threatened with expulsion and imprisonment : <sup>10</sup> he, therefore, thought proper to disown the paper, which was burned by the hands of the common hangman. This sacrifice served only to increase the popular disturbance, which rose to such a height of violence, that the court-party began to tremble ; and the bill was dropped for the present.

38. Lord Coningsby and Mr. Porter had committed the most flagrant acts of oppression in Ireland : these had been explained, during the last session, by the gentlemen who appealed against the administration of lord Sidney ; but they were screened by the ministry ; and therefore the earl of Bellamont now impeached them in the house of commons, of which he and they were members : after an examination of the articles exhibited against them, the commons, who were by this time at the devotion of the court, declared that, considering the state of affairs in Ireland, they did not think them fit grounds for an impeachment. In the course of this session, the nation sustained another misfortune in the fate of Sir Francis Wheeler, who had been appointed commander in chief of the Mediterranean squadron : he received instructions to take under his convoy the merchant ships bound to Turkey, Spain, and Italy ; to cruise thirty days in a certain latitude, for the protection of the Spanish Plate-fleet homeward-bound ; to leave part of his squadron at Cadiz, as convoy to the trade for England ; to proceed with the rest to the Mediterranean ; to join the Spanish fleet in his return ; and to act in concert with them, until he should be joined by the fleet from Turkey and the Straits, and accompany them back to England. About the latter end of October he set sail from St. Helens, and in January arrived at Cadiz with the ships under his convoy : there leaving rear-admiral Hopson, he proceeded for the Mediterranean. In the bay of Gibraltar he was overtaken by a dreadful tempest, under a lee-shore, which he could not possibly weather, and where the ground was so foul that no anchor would hold : this expedient however was tried : a great number of ships were driven ashore, and many perished : the admiral's ship foundered at sea, and he and all his crew were buried in the deep, except two Moors, who were miraculously preserved : two other ships of the line, three ketches, and six merchant ships, were lost. The remains of the fleet were so much shattered, that, instead of prosecuting their voyage, they returned to Cadiz, in order to be refitted, and sheltered from the attempts of the French squadrons, which were still at sea, under the command of Chateau-Renaud and Gabaret. On the twenty-fifth of April, 1694, the king closed the session with a speech in the usual style, and the parliament was prorogued to the eighteenth of September.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>11</sup> Besides the bills already mentioned, the parliament in this session passed an act for taking and stating the public accounts ; another to encourage ship-building ; a third for the better disciplining the navy ; the usual militia act ; and an act enabling his majesty to make grants and leases in the duchy of Cornwall : one was also passed for renewing a clause in an old statute, limiting the number of justices of the peace in the principality of Wales. The duke of Norfolk brought an action in the court of king's-bench against Mr. Germaine for criminal conversation with his duchess : the cause was tried ; and the jury brought in their verdict for 100 marks, and costs of suit, in favor of the plaintiff.

Before the king embarked, he gratified a good number of his friends with promotions : lord Charles Butler, brother to the duke of Ormond, was created lord Butler, of Weston in England, and earl of Arran in Ireland : the earl of Shrewsbury was honored with the title of duke : the earl of Mulgrave, being reconciled to the court measures, was gratified with a pension of £3000, and the title of marquis of Normanby : Henry Herbert was ennobled by the title of baron Herbert of Cherbury ; the earls of Bedford, Devonshire, and Clare were promoted to the rank of dukes ; the marquis of Carmarthen was made duke of Leeds ; lord viscount Sidney, created earl of Romney ; and viscount Newport, earl of Bedford : Russell was advanced to the head of the admiralty-

39. Louis of France being tired of the war, which had impoverished his country, continued to tamper with the duke of Savoy; and, by the canal of the pope, made some offers to the king of Spain, which were rejected: meanwhile he resolved to stand on the defensive during the ensuing campaign, in every part but Catalonia, where his whole naval force might co-operate with the count de Noailles, who commanded the land army. King William, having received intelligence of the design on Barcelona, endeavored to prevent the junction of the Brest and Toulon squadrons, by sending Russell to sea as early as the fleet could be in a condition to sail; but before he arrived at Portsmouth, the Brest squadron had quitted that harbor: on the third of May the admiral sailed from St. Helens with the combined squadrons of England and Holland, amounting to ninety ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, and tenders: he detached captain Pritchard of the Monmouth with two fire-ships, to destroy a fleet of French merchant-ships near Conquet-bay; and this service being performed, he returned to St. Helens, where he had left Sir Cloudesley Shovel with a squadron, to take on board a body of land forces, intended for a descent on the coast of France: these being embarked, under the command of general Ptolemache, the whole fleet sailed again on the twenty-ninth of May: the land and sea officers, in a council of war, agreed that part of the fleet designed for this expedition should separate from the rest, and proceed to Camaret-bay, where the forces should be landed. On the fifth of June, lord Berkley, who commanded this squadron, parted with the grand fleet, and on the seventh anchored between the bays of Camaret and Bertaume: next day the marquis of Carmarthen, afterwards duke of Leeds, who served under Berkley as rear-admiral of the blue, entered Camaret-bay with two large ships and six frigates, to cover the troops in landing. The French had received intelligence of the design, and taken such precautions, under the conduct of the celebrated engineer, Vauban, that the English were exposed to a terrible fire from new-erected batteries, as well as from a strong body of troops; and though board: Sir George Rooke and Sir John Houblon were appointed joint commissioners in the room of Killegrew and Delaval: Charles Montagu was made chancellor of the exchequer; and Sir William Trumbal and John Smith commissioners of the treasury, in the room of Sir Edward Seymour and Mr. Hambden.

the ships cannonaded them with great vigor, the soldiers could not maintain any regularity in landing: a good number were killed in the open boats before they reached the shore; and those who landed were soon repulsed, in spite of all the endeavors of general Ptolemache, who received a wound in the thigh, which proved mortal: 700 soldiers are said to have been lost on this occasion, besides those who were killed on board of the ships: the Monk ship of war was towed off with great difficulty; but a Dutch frigate of thirty guns fell into the hands of the enemy.

40. After this unfortunate attempt, lord Berkley, with the advice of a council of war, sailed back for England, and at St. Helens received orders from the queen to call a council, and deliberate in what manner the ships and forces might be best employed. They agreed to make some attempt on the coast of Normandy: with this view they set sail on the fifth of July: they bombarded Dieppe, and reduced the greatest part of the town to ashes: thence they steered to Havre-de-Grace, which met with the same fate: they harassed the French troops, who marched after them along-shore: they alarmed the whole coast; and filled every town with such consternation, that they would have been abandoned by the inhabitants, had they not been detained by military force. On the twenty-sixth of July, lord Berkley returned to St. Helens, where he quitted the fleet, and the command devolved on Sir Cloudesley Shovel: this officer, having received instructions to make an attempt on Dunkirk, sailed round to the Downs, where he was joined by M. Meesters, with six and twenty Dutch pilots: on the twelfth of September he appeared before Dunkirk; and next day sent in the Charles galley, with two bomb-ketches, and as many of the machines called Infernals: these were set on fire without effect, and the design miscarried: then Shovel steered to Calais, which having bombarded with little success, he returned to the coast of England; and the bomb-ketches and machines were sent into the river Thames.

41. During these transactions, admiral Russell, with the grand fleet, sailed to the Mediterranean; and being joined by rear-admiral Neville from Cadiz, together with Callemberg and Evertzen, he steered towards Barcelona, which was besieged by the French fleet and army: at his approach, Tourville retired with precipitation into the harbor of Toulon; and Noailles abandoned his enterprise. The Spanish affairs were in such a deplorable condition, that without this timely assistance the kingdom must have been undone. While he continued in the Mediterranean, the French admiral durst not venture to appear at sea; and all his projects were disconcerted: after having asserted the honor of the British flag in those seas during the whole summer, he sailed in the beginning of November to Cadiz, where, by an express order of the king, he passed the winter, during which he took such precautions for preventing Tourville from passing the Straits, that he did not think proper to risk the passage.

42. It will now be necessary to describe the operations on the continent. In the middle of May king William arrived in Holland, where he consulted with the States-General: on the third of June he repaired to Bethlem-abbey near Louvain, the place appointed for the rendezvous of the army; and there he was met by the electors of Bavaria and Cologne: in a few days a numerous army was assembled, and every thing seemed to promise an active campaign: on the third of June the dauphin assumed the command of the French forces, with which Luxemburg had taken post between Mons and Maubeuge; and, passing the Sambre, encamped at Fleurus: but on the eighteenth, he removed from thence, and took up his quarters between St. Tron and Wanheim, while the confederates lay at Roosbeck: on the eleventh of July, the dauphin marched in four columns to Oerle on the Jaar, where he pitched his camp: on the twenty-second, the confederates marched to Bomale; then the dauphin took the route to Vignamont, where he secured his army by intrenchments, as his forces were inferior in number to those of the allies; and he had been directed by his father to avoid an engagement. In this situation both armies remained till the fifteenth of August, when king William sent the heavy baggage to Louvain, and on the eighteenth made a motion to Sombref: this was no sooner known to the enemy, than they decamped; and having marched all night, posted themselves between Temploux and Masy, within a league and a half of the confederates. The king of England resolved to pass the Scheldt; and with this view marched, by the way of Nivelles and Soignies, to Chievres: from thence he detached the duke of Wirtemberg, with a strong body of horse and foot, to pass the river at Oudenarde, while the elector of Bavaria advanced with another detachment to pass it at Pont de Espieres. Notwithstanding all the expedition they could make, their purpose was anticipated by Luxemburg, who being apprised of their route, had detached 4000 horse, with each a foot soldier behind the trooper, to reinforce M. de Valette, who commanded that part of the French line: these were sustained by a choice body of men, who travelled with great expedition, without observing the formalities of a march: marshal de Villeroy followed the same route, with all the cavalry of the right wing, the household troops, and twenty field-pieces; and the rest of the army was brought up by the dauphin in person: they marched with such incredible diligence, that the elector of Bavaria could scarce believe his own eyes, when he arrived in sight of the Scheldt, and saw them intrenching themselves on the other side of the river. King William, having reconnoitred their disposition, thought it impracticable to pass at that place; and therefore marched down the river to Oudenarde, where a passage had been already effected by the duke of Wirtemberg: here the confederates passed the Scheldt on the twenty-seventh of the month; and the king fixed his head-quarters at Wanneghem: his intention was to have taken possession of Courtray, and established winter-quarters for a considerable part of his army in that district; but Luxemburg having posted himself between that place and Menin, extended his lines in such a manner, that the confederates could not attempt to force them, nor even hinder him from subsisting his army at the expense of the castellany of Courtray during the remainder of the campaign. This surprising march was of such importance to the French king, that he wrote with his own hand a letter of thanks to his army, and ordered that it should be read to every particular squadron and battalion.

43. The king of England, though disappointed in his scheme on Courtray, found means to make some advantage of his superiority in number: he drafted troops from the garrison of Liege and Maestricht; and on the third of September reinforced his body with a large detachment from his own camp, conferring the command on the duke of Holstein-Ploen, with orders to undertake the siege of Huy: next day the whole confederate forces passed the Lys, and encamped at Wouterghem: from thence the king, with part of the army, marched to Roselaer: this diversion obliged the dauphin to make considerable detachments, for the security of Ypres and Menin on one side, and to cover Furnes and Dunkirk on the other: at this juncture, a Frenchman, being seized in the very act of setting fire to one of the ammunition wag-gons in the allied army, confessed he had been employed for this purpose by some of the French generals, and suffered death as a traitor. On the sixteenth of the month, the duke of Holstein-Ploen invested Huy, and carried on the siege with such vigor that in ten days the garrison capitulated: the king ordered Dixmuyde, Deynese, Ninove, and Tirlemont to be secured for winter-quarters to part of the army: the dauphin returned to Versailles: William quitted the camp on the last day of September, and both armies broke up about the middle of October.

44. The operations on the Rhine were preconcerted between king William and the prince of Baden, who had visited London in the winter: the dispute between the emperor and the elector of Saxony was compromised; and this young prince dying during the negociation, the treaty was perfected by his brother and successor, who engaged to furnish 12,000 men yearly, in consideration of a subsidy from the court of Vienna. In the beginning of June, marshal de Lorges passed the Rhine at Philipsburg, in order to give battle to the imperialists, encamped at Heilbron: the prince of Baden, who was not yet joined by the Saxons, Hessians, nor by the troops of Munster and Paderborn, despatched couriers to quicken the march of these auxiliaries, and advanced to Eppingen, where he proposed to wait till they should come up; but, on the fifteenth, receiving undoubted intelligence that the enemy were in motion towards him, he advanced to meet them in order of battle: de Lorges concluded that this was a desperate effort, and immediately halted to make the necessary preparations for an engagement: this pause enabled prince Louis to take possession of a strong pass near Sintzheim, from which he could not easily be dislodged: then the marshal proceeded to Viseloch, and ravaged the adjacent country, in hopes of drawing the imperialists from their intrenchments. The prince, being joined by the Hessians, resolved to beat up the quarters of the enemy; and the French general being apprised of his design, retreated at midnight with the utmost precipitation: having posted himself at Ruth, he sent his heavy baggage to Philipsburg: then he moved to Gonsburg, in the neighborhood of Mannheim, repassed the Rhine, and encamped between Spiers and Worms. The prince of Baden being joined by the allies, passed the river by a bridge of boats near Hagenbach, in the middle of September; and laid the country of Alsace under contribution: considering the advanced season of the year, this was a rash undertaking; and the French general resolved to profit by his enemy's temerity: he forthwith advanced against the imperialists, foreseeing that should they be worsted in battle, their whole army would be ruined: prince Louis, informed of his intention, immediately passed the Rhine; and this retreat was no sooner effected, than the river swelled to such a degree, that the island in the middle, and great part of the camp he had occupied, was overflowed: soon after this incident both armies retired into winter-quarters. The campaign in Hungary produced no event of importance: it was opened by the new visir, who arrived at Belgrade in the middle of August; and about the same time Caprara assembled the imperial army in the neighborhood of Peterwaradin. The Turks passed the Saave, in order to attack their camp, and carried on their approaches with 500 pieces of cannon, but made very little progress: the imperialists received reinforcements; the season wasted away; a feud arose between the visir and the cham of the Tartars; and the Danube being swelled by heavy rains, so as to interrupt the operations of the Turks, their general decamped in the night of the first of October: they afterwards made an unsuccessful attempt on Titul, while the imperial general made himself master of Giula. In the course of this summer, the Venetians, who were also at war with the Turks, reduced Cyclut, a place of importance on the river Naranta, and made a conquest of the island of Scio in the Archipelago.

45. We have already observed, that the French king had determined to act vigorously in Catalonia. In the beginning of May, the duke de Noailles advanced at the head of 28,000 men to the river Ter, on the opposite bank of which the viceroy of Catalonia was encamped with 16,000 Spaniards: the French general passed the river in the face of this army, and attacked their intrenchments with such impetuosity, that in less than an hour they were totally defeated: then he marched to Palamos, and undertook the siege of that place; while at the same time it was blocked up by the combined squadrons of Brest and Toulon: though the besieged made an obstinate defence, the town was taken by storm, the houses were pillaged, and the people put to the sword, without distinction of age, sex, or condition: then he invested Gironne, which in a few days capitulated: Ostalric met with the same fate, and Noailles was created viceroy of Catalonia by the French king: in the beginning of August he distributed his forces into quarters of refreshment along the river Terdore, resolving to undertake the siege of Barcelona, which was saved by the arrival of admiral Russell. The war languished in Piedmont, on account of a secret negociation between the king of France and the duke of Savoy; notwithstanding the remonstrances of Rouvigny, earl of Galway, who had succeeded the duke of Schomberg in the command of the British forces in that country: Casal was closely blocked up by the reduction of Fort St. George, and the Vaudois gained the advantage in some skirmishes in the valley of Ragelas; but no design of importance was executed.<sup>12</sup>

46. England had continued very quiet under the queen's administration, if we except some little commotions occasioned by the practices, or pretended practices, of the Jacobites: prosecutions were revived against certain gentlemen of Lancashire and Cheshire, for having been concerned in the conspiracy formed in favor of the late king's projected invasion from Normandy: these steps were owing to the suggestions of infamous informers, whom the ministry countenanced: colonel Parker and one Crosby were imprisoned, and bills of treason found against them; but Parker made his escape from the Tower, and was never retaken, though a reward of £400 was set on his head. The king, having settled the affairs of the confederacy at the Hague, embarked for England on the eighth of November, and next day landed at Margate: on the twelfth he opened the session of parliament with a speech, in which he observed that the posture of affairs was improved both by sea and land since they last parted; in particular, that a stop was put to the progress of the French arms: he desired they would continue the act of tonnage and poundage, which would expire at Christmas; he reminded them of the debt for the transport ships employed in the reduction of Ireland; and exhorted them to prepare some good bill for the encouragement of seamen: a majority in both houses was already secured; and in all probability he bargained for their condescension by agreeing to the bill for triennial parliaments : this Mr. Harley brought in by order of the lower house, immediately after their first adjournment ; and it kept pace with the consideration of the supplies. The commons, having examined the estimates and accounts, voted £4,764,712 for the service of the army and navy : in order to raise this sum, they continued the land tax, they renewed the subsidy of tonnage and poundage for five years, and imposed new duties on different commodities.<sup>13</sup> The triennial bill enacted, that a parliament should be held once in three years at least ; that within three years at farthest after the dissolution of the parliament then subsisting, and so from time to time, for ever after, legal writs under the great seal should be issued, by the direction of the crown, for calling, assembling, and holding another new parliament ; that no parliament should continue longer than three years at farthest, to be accounted from the first day of the first session ; and, that the parliament then subsisting should cease and determine on the first of November next following, unless their majesties should think fit to dissolve it sooner. The duke of Devonshire, the marquis of Halifax, the earls of Weymouth and Aylesbury protested against this bill, because it tended to the continuance of the present parliament longer than, as they apprehended, was agreeable to the constitution of England.

47. While this bill was depending, Dr. John Tillotson, archbishop of Canterbury, was seized with a fit of the dead palsy in the chapel of Whitehall, and died on the 22nd of November, deeply regretted by the king and queen, who shed tears of sorrow at his decease ; and sincerely lamented by the public, as a pattern of elegance, ingenuity, meekness, charity, and moderation : these qualities he must be allowed to have possessed, notwithstanding the invectives of his enemies, who accused him of puritanism, flattery, and ambition ; and charged him with having conduced to a dangerous schism in the church, by accepting the archbishopric during the life of the deprived Sancroft. He was succeeded in the metropolitan see by Dr. Tennison, bishop of Lincoln, recommended by the whig party, which now predominated in the cabinet. The queen did not long survive her favorite prelate: in about a month after his decease, she was taken ill of the small-pox; and the symptoms proving dangerous, she prepared herself for death with great composure: she spent some time in exercises of devotion, and private conversation with the new archbishop; she received the sacrament with all the bishops who were in attendance; and expired on the twenty-eighth of December, in the thirty-third year of her age and in the sixth of her reign, to the inexpressible grief of the king, who for some weeks after her death could neither see company nor attend to the business of state. Mary was in her person tall and well-proportioned, with an oval visage, lively eyes, agreeable features, a mild aspect, and an air of dignity: her apprehension was clear, her memory tenacious, and her judgment solid: she was a zealous protestant, scrupulously exact in all the duties of devotion, of an even temper, and of a calm and mild conversation: she was ruffled by no passion, and seems to have been a stranger to the emotions of natural affection; for she ascended, without compunction, the throne from which her father had been deposed, and treated her sister as an alien to her blood: in a word, Mary seems to have imbibed the cold disposition and apathy of her husband; and to have centred all her ambition in deserving the epithet of an humble and obedient wife.<sup>14</sup>

48. The princess Anne being informed of the queen's dangerous indisposition, sent a lady of her bed-chamber to desire she might be admitted to her majesty; but this request was not granted: she was thanked for her expression of concern, and given to understand that the physicians had directed that the queen should be kept as quiet as possible:

<sup>14</sup> Her obsequies were performed with great magnificence: the body was attended from Whitehall to Westminster-abbey by all the judges, serjeants at law, the lord mayor, and aldermen of the city of London, and both houses of parliament; and the funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Tennison, archbishop of Canterbury: Dr. Kenn, the deprived bishop of Bath and Wells, reproached him in a letter, for not having called on her majesty on her death-bed to repent of the share she had in the revolution: this was answered by another pamphlet. One of the Jacobite clergy insulted the queen's memory, by preaching on the following text: 'Go now, see this cursed woman, and bury her, for she is a king's daughter.' On the other hand, the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London came to a resolution to erect her statue, with that of the king, in the Royal Exchange.

before her death, however, she sent a forgiving message to her sister; and, after her decease, the earl of Sunderland effected a reconciliation between the king and the princess, who visited him at Kensington, where she was received with uncommon civility: he appointed the palace of St. James's for her residence, and presented her with the greater part of the queen's jewels; but a mutual jealousy and disgust subsisted under these exteriors of friendship and esteem. The two houses of parliament waited on the king at Kensington, with consolatory addresses on the death of his consort: their example was followed by the regency of Scotland, the city and clergy of London, the dissenting ministers, and almost all the great corporations in England.<sup>15</sup>

<sup>15</sup> The earls of Rochester and Nottingham are said to have started a doubt whether the parliament was not dissolved by the queen's death; but this dangerous motion met with no countenance.

1. THE kingdom now resounded with the complaints of the papists and malcontents, who taxed the ministry with subornation of perjury in the case of the Lancashire gentlemen who had been prosecuted for the conspiracy: one Lunt, an Irishman, had informed Sir John Trenchard, secretary of state, that he had been sent from Ireland, with commissions from king James to divers gentlemen in Lancashire and Cheshire; that he had assisted in buying arms and enlisting men to serve that king in his projected invasion of England; that he had been twice despatched by those gentlemen to the court of St. Germain; assisted many Jacobites in repairing to France; helped to conceal others that came from that kingdom; and that all those persons told him they were furnished with money by Sir John Friend to defray the expense of their expeditions. His testimony was confirmed by other infamous emissaries, who received but too much countenance from the government: blank warrants were issued, and filled up occasionally with such names as the informers suggested: these were delivered to Aaron Smith, solicitor to the treasury, who, with messengers, accompanied Lunt and his associates to Lancashire, under the protection of a party of Dutch horse-guards, commanded by one captain Baker: they were empowered to break open houses, seize papers, and apprehend persons, according to their pleasure; and they committed many acts of violence and oppression: the persons, against whom these measures were taken, being apprised of the impending danger, generally retired from their own habitations: some, however, were taken and imprisoned; a few arms were secured; and, in the house of Mr. Standish, at Standish-hall, they found the draft of a declaration to be published by king James at his landing. As this prosecution seemed calculated to revive the horror of a stale conspiracy, and the evidences were persons of abandoned characters, the friends of those who were persecuted found no great difficulty in rendering the scheme odious to the nation: they even employed the pen of Ferguson, who had been concerned in every plot that was hatched since the Rye-house conspiracy: this veteran, appointed housekeeper to the Excise-office, thought himself poorly recompensed for the part he had acted in the Revolution, became dissatisfied, and, on this occasion, published a letter to Sir John Trenchard on the abuse of power: it was replete with the most bitter invectives against the ministry, and contained a great number of flagrant instances, in which the court had countenanced the vilest corruption, perfidy, and oppression: this production was in every body's hand, and had such an effect on the people, that when the prisoners were brought to trial at Manchester, the populace would have put the witnesses to death, had they not been prevented by the interposition of those who were friends to the accused persons, and had already taken effectual measures for their safety. Lunt's chief associate in the mystery of information was one Taaffe, a wretch of the most profligate principles, who finding himself disappointed in his hope of reward from the ministry, was privately gained over by the agents for the prisoners: Lunt, when desired in court to point out the persons whom he had accused, committed such a mistake as greatly invalidated his testimony; and Taaffe declared before the bench that the pretended plot was no other than a contrivance between himself and Lunt, in order to procure money from the government: the prisoners were immediately acquitted, and the ministry incurred a heavy load of popular odium, as the authors or abettors of knavish contrivances to ensnare the innocent: the government, with a view to evince their abhorrence of such practices, ordered the witnesses to be prosecuted for a conspiracy against the lives and estates of the gentlemen who had been accused; and at last the affair was brought into the house of commons. The Jacobites triumphed in their victory: they even turned the battery of corruption on the evidence for the crown, not without making a considerable impression: but the cause was now debated before judges who were not at all propitious to their views: the commons, having set on foot an inquiry, and examined all the papers and circumstances relating to the pretended plot, resolved that there was sufficient ground for the prosecution and trials of the gentlemen at Manchester, and that there was a dangerous conspiracy against the king and government: they issued an order for taking Mr. Standish into custody; and the messenger reporting that he was not to be found, they presented an address to the king, desiring a proclamation might be published, offering a reward for apprehending his person: the peers concurred with the commons in their sentiments of this affair; for complaints having been laid before their house also by the persons who thought themselves aggrieved, the question was put, whether the government had cause to prosecute them; and carried in the affirmative, though a protest was entered against this vote by the earls of Rochester and Nottingham. Notwithstanding these decisions, the accused gentlemen prosecuted Lunt and two of his accomplices for perjury at the Lancaster assizes; and all three were found guilty: they were immediately indicted by the crown for a conspiracy against the lives and liberties of the persons they had accused: the intention of the ministry, in laying this indictment, was to seize the opportunity of punishing some of the witnesses for the gentlemen, who had prevaricated in giving their testimony; but the design being discovered, the Lancashire men refused to produce their evidence against the informers; the prosecution dropped of consequence, and the prisoners were discharged.

2. When the commons were employed in examining the state of the revenue, and taking measures for raising the necessary supplies, the inhabitants of Royston presented a petition, complaining that the officers and soldiers of the regiment belonging to colonel Hastings, which was quartered on them, exacted subsistence-money, even on pain of military execution: the house was immediately kindled into a flame by this information: the officers, and Pauncefort, agent for the regiment, were examined: then it was unanimously resolved, that such a practice was arbitrary, illegal, and a violation of the rights and liberties of the subject. On farther inquiry, Pauncefort and some other agents were committed to the custody of the sergeant, for having neglected to pay the subsistence money they had received for the officers and soldiers: he was afterwards sent to the Tower, together with Henry Guy, a member of the house, and secretary to the treasury; the one for giving, and the other for receiving a bribe to obtain the king's bounty: Pauncefort's brother was likewise committed for being concerned in the same commerce: Guy had been employed, together with Trevor, the speaker, as the court-agent for securing a majority in the house of commons: for that reason he was obnoxious to the members in the opposition, who took this opportunity to brand him; and the courtiers could not with any decency screen him from their vengeance. The house having proceeded in this inquiry, drew up an address to the king, enumerating the abuses which had crept into the army, and demanding immediate redress: he promised to consider the remonstrance, and redress the grievances of which they complained: accordingly, he cashiered colonel Hastings; appointed a council of officers to sit weekly and examine all complaints against any officer and soldier; and published a declaration for the maintenance of strict discipline, and the due payment of quarters. Notwithstanding these concessions, the commons prosecuted their examinations; they committed Mr. James Craggs, one of the contractors for clothing the army, because he refused to answer on oath to such questions as might be put to him by the commissioners of accounts:<sup>16</sup> they brought in a bill for obliging him and Mr. Richard Harnage the other contractor, together with the two Paunceforts, to discover how they had disposed of the sums paid into their hands on account of the army; and for punishing them, in case they should persist in their refusal. At this period they received a petition against the commissioners for licensing hackney-coaches: three of them, by means of an address to the king, were removed with disgrace, for having acted arbitrarily, corruptly, and contrary to the trust reposed in them by act of parliament [1695.]

3. Those who encouraged this spirit of reformation introduced another inquiry about the orphans' bill, which was said to have passed into an act by virtue of undue influence: a committee being appointed to inspect the chamberlain's books, discovered that bribes had been given to Sir John Trevor, speaker of the house, and Mr. Hungerford, chairman of the grand committee: the first being voted guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, abdicated the chair, and Paul Foley was appointed speaker in his room: then Sir John and Mr. Hungerford were expelled the house; one Nois, a solicitor for the bill, was taken into custody, because he had scandalised the commons, in pretending he was engaged to give great sums to several members, and denying this circumstance on his examination. The reformers in the house naturally concluded that the same arts had been practised in obtaining the new charter of the East-India company, which had been granted so much against the sense of the nation: their books were subjected to the same committee that carried on the former inquiry, and a surprising scene of venality and corruption was soon disclosed: it appeared that the company, in the course of the preceding year, had paid near £90,000 in secret services; and that Sir Thomas Cooke, one of the directors, and a member of the house, had been the chief manager of this infamous commerce: Cooke, refusing to answer, was committed to the Tower, and a bill of pains and penalties brought in, obliging him to discover how the sum mentioned in the report of the committee had been distributed: the bill was violently opposed in the upper house by the duke of Leeds, as being contrary to law and equity, and furnishing a precedent of a dangerous nature. Cooke being, agreeably to his own petition, brought to the bar of the house of lords, declared that he was ready and willing to make a full discovery, in case he might be favored with an indemnifying vote, to secure him against all actions and suits, except those of the East-India company, which he had never injured: the lords complied with his request, and passed a bill for this purpose, to which the commons added a penal clause; and the former was laid aside.

4. When the king went to the house, to give the royal assent to the money-bills, he endeavored to discourage this inquiry, by telling the parliament that the season of the year was far advanced, and the circumstances of affairs extremely pressing: he therefore desired they would despatch such business as they should think of most importance to the public, as he should put an end to the session in a few days. Notwithstanding this shameful interposition, both houses appointed a joint committee to lay open the complicated scheme of fraud and iniquity: Cooke, on his first examination, confessed that he had delivered talleys for £10,000 to Francis Tyssen, deputy-governor, for the special service of the company; an equal sum to Richard Acton, for employing his interest in preventing a new settlement, and endeavoring to establish the old company; besides £2000 by way of interest, and as a farther gratuity: 1000 guineas to colonel Fitzpatrick, 500 to Charles Bates, and 310 to Mr. Molineux, a merchant, for the same purposes; and he owned that Sir Basil Firebrace had received £40,000 on various pretences: he said, he believed that the £10,000 paid to Tyssen had been delivered to the king by Sir Josiah Child, as a customary present which former kings had received; and that the sums paid to Acton were distributed among some members of parliament. Firebrace being examined, affirmed that he had received the whole £40,000 for his own use and benefit; but that Bates had received sums of money, which he understood were offered to some persons of the first quality: Acton declared that £10,000 of the sum which he had received was distributed among persons who had interest with members of parliament; and that great part of the money passed through the hands of Craggs, who was acquainted with some colonels in the house, and northern members: Bates owned he had received the money, in consideration of using his interest with the duke of Leeds in favor of the company; that this nobleman knew of the gratuity; and that the sum was reckoned by his grace's domestic, one Robart, a foreigner, who kept it in his possession until this inquiry was talked of, and then it was returned: in a word, it appeared by this man's testimony, as well as by that of Firebrace on his second examination, that the duke of Leeds was not free from corruption, and that Sir John Trevor was a hireling prostitute.

5. The report of the committee produced violent alterations, and the most severe strictures on the conduct of the lord president: at length, the house resolved, that there was sufficient matter to impeach Thomas duke of Leeds of high crimes and misdemeanors, and that he should be impeached thereon: then it was ordered, that Mr. comptroller Warton should impeach him before the lords in the name of the house, and of all the commons in England: the duke was actually in the middle of a speech for his own justification, in which he assured the house, on his honor, that he was not guilty of the corruptions laid to his charge, when one of his friends gave him intimation of the votes which had passed in the commons: he concluded his speech abruptly; and, repairing to the lower house, desired he might be indulged with a hearing: he was accordingly admitted with the compliment of a chair, and leave to be covered: after having sat a few minutes, he took off his hat, and addressed himself to the commons in very extraordinary terms. Having thanked them for the favor of indulging him with a hearing, he said that house would not have been then sitting but for him: he protested his own innocence with respect to the crime laid to his charge: he complained that this was the effect of a design which had been long formed against him: he expressed a deep sense of his being under the displeasure of the parliament and nation, and demanded speedy justice. They forthwith drew up the articles of impeachment, which being exhibited at the bar of the upper house, he pleaded not guilty, and the commons promised to make good their charge; but, by this time, such arts had been used, as all at once checked the violence of the prosecution: such a number of considerable persons were involved in this mystery of corruption, that a full discovery was dreaded by both parties: the duke sent his domestic, Robart, out of the kingdom, and his absence furnished a pretence for postponing the trial: in a word, the inquiry was dropped; but the scandal stuck fast to the duke's character.

6. In the midst of these deliberations, the king went to the house on the third of May, when he thanked the parliament for the supplies they had granted; signified his intention of going abroad; assured them he would place the administration of affairs in persons of known care and fidelity; and desired that the members of both houses would be more than ordinarily vigilant in preserving the public peace: the parliament was then prorogued to the eighteenth of June.<sup>17</sup> The king immediately appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence; but neither the princess of Denmark nor her husband were entrusted with any share in the administration;—a circumstance that evinced the king's jealousy, and gave offence to a great part of the nation.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>17</sup> In the course of this session, the lords had inquired into the particulars of the Mediterranean expedition, and presented an address to the king, declaring that the fleet in those seas had conduced to the honor and advantage of the nation: on the other hand, the commons, in an address, besought his majesty to take care that the kingdom might be put on an equal footing and proportion with the allies, in defraying the expense of the war. The coin of the kingdom being greatly diminished and adulterated, the earls of Rochester and Nottingham expatiated on this national evil in the house of lords; and an act was passed, containing severer penalties against clippers; but this produced no good effect: the value of money sunk in the exchange to such a degree, that a guinea was reckoned adequate to thirty shillings; and this public disgrace lowered the credit of the funds and of the government. The nation was alarmed by the circulation of fictitious wealth, instead of gold and silver, such as bank-bills, exchequer talleys, and government securities: the malcontents took this opportunity to exclaim against the bank, and even attempted to shake the credit of it in parliament; but their endeavors proved abortive: the moneyed interest preponderated in both houses.

7. A session of parliament was deemed necessary in Scotland, to provide new subsidies for the maintenance of the troops of that kingdom, which had been so serviceable in the prosecution of the war: but, as a great outcry had been raised against the government on account of the massacre of Glencoe, and the Scots were tired of contributing towards the expense of a war from which they could derive no advantage, the ministry thought proper to cajole them with the promise of some national indulgence: in the meantime, a commission passed the great seal for taking a pre-cognition of the massacre, as a previous step to the trial of the persons concerned in that perfidious transaction. On the ninth of May, the session was opened by the marquis of Tweeddale, appointed commissioner, who, after the king's letter had been read, expatiated on his majesty's care and concern for their safety and welfare, and his firm purpose to maintain the presbyterian discipline in the church of Scotland: then he promised, in the king's name, that if they would pass an act for establishing a colony in Africa, America, or any other part of the world where a colony might be lawfully planted, his majesty would indulge them with such rights and privileges as he had granted in like cases to the subjects of his other dominions: finally, he exhorted them to consider ways and means to raise the necessary supplies for maintaining their land forces, and for providing a competent number of ships of war to protect their commerce. The parliament immediately voted an address of condolence to his majesty on the death of the queen; and they granted £120,000 sterling for the services of the ensuing year, to be raised by a general poll-tax, a land-tax, and an additional excise.

Somers, lord keeper of the great seal; the earl of Pembroke, lord privy-seal; the duke of Devonshire, lord steward of the household; the duke of Shrewsbury, secretary of state; the earl of Dorset, lord chamberlain; and the lord Godolphin, first commissioner of the treasury. Sir John Trenchard dying, his place of secretary was filled with Sir William Trumbal, an eminent civilian, learned, diligent, and virtuous, who had been envoy at Paris and Constantinople. William Nassau de Zuylestein, son of the king's natural uncle, was created baron of Enfield, viscount Tunbridge, and earl of Rochford; Ford, lord Grey of Werke, was made viscount Glendale, and earl of Tankerville. The month of April of this year was distinguished by the death of the famous George Saville, marquis of Halifax, who had survived in a good measure his talents and reputation.

8. Their next step was to desire the commissioner would transmit their humble thanks to the king for his care to vindicate the honor of the government and the justice of the nation, in ordering a precognition to be taken with respect to the slaughter of Glencoe: a motion was afterwards made that the commissioners should exhibit an account of their proceedings in this affair: accordingly, a report, consisting of the king's instructions, Dalrymple's letters, the depositions of witnesses, and the opinion of the committee was laid before the parliament: the motion is said to have been privately influenced by secretary Johnston, for the disgrace of Dalrymple, who was his rival in power and interest. The written opinion of the commissioners, who were creatures of the court, imported, that Macdonald of Glencoe had been perfidiously murdered; that the king's instructions contained nothing to warrant the massacre; and that secretary Dalrymple had exceeded his orders: the parliament concurred with this report: they resolved that Livingston was not to blame for having given the orders contained in his letters to lieutenant colonel Hamilton: that this last was liable to prosecution: that the king should be addressed to give orders, either for examining major Duncanson in Flanders, touching his concern in this affair, or for sending him home to be tried in Scotland: as also, that Campbell of Glenlyon, captain Drummond, lieutenant Lindsey, ensign Lundy, and serjeant Barber should be sent to Scotland, and prosecuted according to law for the parts they had acted in that execution. In consequence of these resolutions, the parliament drew up an address to the king, in which they laid the whole blame of the massacre on the excess in the master of Stair's letters concerning that transaction: they begged that his majesty would give such orders about him, as he should think fit for the vindication of his government; that the actors in that barbarous slaughter might be prosecuted by the king's advocate according to law; and that some reparation might be made to the men of Glencoe who escaped the massacre, for the losses they had sustained in their effects on that occasion, as their habitations had been plundered and burned, their lands wasted, and their cattle driven away; so that they were reduced to extreme poverty. Notwithstanding this address of the Scottish parliament, by which the king was so solemnly exculpated, his memory is still loaded with the suspicion of having concerted, countenanced, and enforced this barbarous execution; especially as the master of Stair escaped with impunity, and the other actors of the tragedy, far from being punished, were preferred in the service. While the commissioners were employed in the inquiry, they made such discoveries concerning the conduct of the earl of Breadalbane, as amounted to a charge of high-treason, and he was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh; but it seems he had dissembled with the highlanders by the king's permission, and now sheltered himself under the shadow of a royal pardon.

9. The committee of trade, in pursuance of the powers granted by the king to his commissioner, prepared an act for establishing a company trading to Africa and the Indies, empowering them to plant colonies, hold cities, towns, or forts, in places uninhabited, or in others, with the consent of the natives; vesting them with an exclusive right, and an exemption for one-and-twenty years from all duties and impositions: this act was likewise confirmed by letters-patent under the great seal, directed by the parliament, without any farther warrant from the crown. Patterson, the projector, had contrived the scheme of a settlement on the isthmus of Darien, in such a manner as to carry on a trade in the South-Sea, as well as in the Atlantic; nay, even to extend it as far as the East-Indies: a great number of London merchants, allured by the prospect of gain, were eager to engage in such a company, exempted from all manner of imposition and restriction: the Scottish parliament likewise passed an act in favor of the episcopal clergy, decreeing, that those who should enter into such engagements to the king as were by law required, might continue in their benefices under his majesty's protection, without being subject to the power of presbytery: seventy of the most noted ministers of that persuasion took the benefit of this indulgence: another law was enacted for raising 9000 men early to recruit the Scottish regiments abroad; and an act for erecting a public bank: then the parliament was adjourned to the seventh of November.

10. Ireland began to be infected with the same factions which had broke out in England since the revolution: lord Capel, the lord-deputy, governed in a very partial manner, oppressing the Irish papists, without any regard to equity or decorum: he undertook to model a parliament in such a manner, that they should comply with all the demands of the ministry; and he succeeded in his endeavors, by making such arbitrary changes in offices as best suited his purpose. These precautions being taken, he convoked a parliament for the twenty-seventh of August, when he opened the session with a speech, expatiating on their obligations to king William, and exhorting them to make suitable returns to such a gracious sovereign : he observed that the revenue had fallen short of the establishment, so that both the civil and military lists were greatly in debt ; that his majesty had sent over a bill for an additional excise, and expected they would find ways and means to answer the demands of the service : they forthwith voted an address of thanks, and resolved to assist his majesty to the utmost of their power against all his enemies foreign and domestic : they passed the bill for an additional excise, together with an act for taking away the writs de hæretico comburendo ; another annulling all attainders and acts passed in the late pretended parliament of king James ; a third to prevent foreign education ; a fourth for disarming papists ; and a fifth for settling the estates of intestates : then they resolved, that a sum not exceeding £163,325, should be granted to his majesty, to be raised by a poll-bill, additional customs, and a continuation of the additional excise. Sir Charles Porter, the chancellor, finding his importance diminished, if not intirely destroyed, by the assuming disposition and power of the lord-deputy, began to court popularity by espousing the cause of the Irish against the severity of the administration, and actually formed a kind of tory interest, which thwarted lord Capel in all his measures : a motion was made in parliament to impeach the chancellor for sowing discord and division among his majesty's subjects ; but, being indulged with a hearing by the house of commons, he justified himself so much to their satisfaction, that he was voted clear of all imputation by a great majority : nevertheless, they, at the end of the session, sent over an address, in which they bore testimony to the mild and just administration of their lord-deputy.

11. King William having taken such steps as were deemed necessary for preserving the peace of England in his absence, crossed the sea to Holland in the middle of May, fully determined to make some great effort in the Netherlands, that might aggrandise his military character, and humble the power of France, which was already on the decline. That kingdom was actually exhausted in such a manner, that the haughty Louis found himself obliged to stand on the defensive against enemies over whom he had been used to triumph with uninterrupted success : he heard the clamors of his people, which he could not quiet ; he saw his advances to peace rejected ; and, to crown his misfortunes, he sustained an irreparable loss in the death of Francis de Montmorency, duke of Luxemburg, to whose military talents he owed the greatest part of his glory and success : that great officer died in January at Versailles, in the sixty-seventh year of his age ; and Louis lamented his death the more deeply, as he had not another general left in whose understanding he could confide : the conduct of the army in Flanders was entrusted to marshal Villeroy ; and Boufflers commanded a separate army, though subject to the other's orders. As the French king took it for granted that the confederates would have a superiority of numbers in the field, and was well acquainted with the enterprising genius of their chief, he ordered a new line to be drawn between the Lys and the Scheldt ; he caused a disposition to be made for covering Dunkirk, Ypres, Tournay, and Namur ; and laid injunctions on his general to act solely on the defensive. Meanwhile, the confederates formed two armies in the Netherlands : the first consisted of seventy battalions of infantry, and eighty-two squadrons of horse and dragoons, chiefly English and Scots, encamped at Aerseele, Caneghem, and Wouterghem, between Thieldt and Deynse, to be commanded by the king in person, assisted by the old prince of Vaudemont : the other army, composed of sixteen battalions of foot, and 100 squadrons of horse, encamped at Zellech and Hamme, on the road from Brussels to Dendermond, under the command of the elector of Bavaria, seconded by the duke of Holstein-Ploen : major-general Ellemberg was posted near Dixmuyde with twenty battalions and ten squadrons, and another body of Brandenburg and Dutch troops, with a reinforcement from Liege, lay encamped on the Mehaigne, under the conduct of the baron de Heyden, lieutenant-general of Brandenburg ; and the count de Berlo, general of the Liege cavalry. King William arrived in the camp on the fifth of July, and remained eight days at Aerseele, then he marched to Bekelar, while Villeroy retired behind his lines between Menin and Ypres, after having detached 10,000 men to reinforce Boufflers, who had advanced to Point d'Espieres ; but he too retreating within his lines, the elector of Bavaria passed the Scheldt, and took post at Kirkhoven : at the same time the body under Heyden advanced towards Namur.

12. The king of England, having by his motions drawn the forces of the enemy on the side of Flanders, directed the baron de Heyden and the earl of Athlone, who commanded forty squadrons from the camp of the elector of Bavaria, to invest Namur; and this service was performed on the third of July: but, as the place was not intirely surrounded, marshal Boufflers threw himself into it with such a reinforcement of dragoons, as augmented the garrison to the number of 15,000 chosen men: king William and the elector brought up the rest of the forces, which encamped on both sides of the Sambre and the Maese; and the lines of circumvallation were begun on the sixth of July, under the direction of the celebrated engineer, general Coehorn: the place was formerly very strong, both by situation and art; but the French, since its last reduction, had made such additional works, that both the town and citadel seemed impregnable: considering the number of the garrison, and the quality of the troops, commanded by a marshal of France, distinguished by his valor and conduct, the enterprise was deemed an undeniable proof of William's temerity. On the eleventh the trenches were opened, and next day the batteries began to play with incredible fury: the king receiving intelligence of a motion made by a body of French troops, with a view to intercept the convoys, detached twenty squadrons of horse and dragoons to observe the enemy.

13. Prince Vaudemont, who was left at Roselaer with fifty battalions and the like number of squadrons, understanding that Villeroy had passed the Lys in order to attack him, took post with his left near Grammen, his right by Aerseele and Caneghem, and began to fortify his camp, with a view to expect the enemy: their vanguard appearing on the evening of the thirteenth at Dentregthem, he changed the disposition of his camp, and intrenched himself on both sides: next day, however, perceiving Villeroy's design was to surround him by means of another body of troops commanded by M. Montal, who had already passed the Thieldt for that purpose, he resolved to avoid an engagement, and effected a retreat to Ghent, which is celebrated as one of the most capital efforts of military conduct. he forthwith detached twelve battalions and twelve pieces of cannon, to secure Newport, which Villeroy had intended to invest: but that general now changed his resolution, and undertook the siege of Dixmuyde, garrisoned by eight battalions of foot, and a regiment of dragoons, commanded by major-general Ellemberg, who, in six-and-thirty hours after the trenches were opened, surrendered himself and his soldiers prisoners of war. This scandalous example was followed by colonel O'Farrell, who yielded up Deynse on the same shameful conditions, even before a battery was opened by the besiegers: in the sequel they were both tried for their misbehavior: Ellemberg suffered death, and O'Farrell was broken with infamy. The prince of Vaudemont sent a message to the French general, demanding the garrisons of those two places, according to a cartel which had been settled between the powers at war; but no regard was paid to this remonstrance: Villeroy, after several marches and countermarches, appeared before Brussels on the thirteenth of August, and sent a letter to the prince of Berghem, governor of that city, importing that the king his master had ordered him to bombard the town, by way of making reprisals for the damage done by the English fleet to the maritime towns of France: he likewise desired to know in what part the electress of Bavaria resided, that he might not fire into that quarter: after this declaration, which was no more than an unmeaning compliment, he began to bombard and cannonade the place with red-hot bullets, which produced conflagrations in many different parts of the city, and frightened the electress into a miscarriage: on the fifteenth, the French discontinued their firing, and retired to Enghien.

14. During these transactions, the siege of Namur was prosecuted with great ardor under the eye of the king of England, while the garrison defended the place with equal spirit and perseverance: on the eighteenth of July, major-general Ramsay and lord Cutts, at the head of five battalions, English, Scots, and Dutch, attacked the enemy's advanced works, on the right of the counterscarp: they were sustained by six English battalions, commanded by brigadier-general Fitzpatrick; while eight foreign regiments, with 9000 pioneers, advanced on the left, under major-general Salisch. The assault was desperate and bloody, the enemy maintaining their ground for two hours with undaunted courage; but at last they were obliged to give way, and were pursued to the very gates of the town, though not before they had killed or wounded 1200 men of the confederate army. The king was so well pleased with the behavior of the British troops, that during the action he laid his hand on the shoulder of the elector of Bavaria, and exclaimed with emotion, 'See my brave English!' On the twenty-seventh the English and Scots, under Ramsay and Hamilton, assaulted the counterscarp, where they met with prodigious opposition from the fire of the besieged: nevertheless, being sustained by the Dutch, they made a lodgement on the foremost covered way before the gate of St. Nicholas, as also on part of the counterscarp: the valor of the assailants on this occasion was altogether unprecedented, and almost incredible; while, on the other hand, the courage of the besieged was worthy of praise and admiration: several persons were killed in the trenches at the side of the king, and among these Mr. Godfrey, deputy-governor of the bank of England, who had come to the camp to confer with his majesty about remitting money for the payment of the army. On the thirtieth of July the elector of Bavaria attacked Vauban's line that surrounded the works of the castle: general Coehorn was present in this action, which was performed with equal valor and success: they not only broke through the line, but even took possession of Coehorn's fort, in which, however, they found it impossible to effect a lodgement. On the second of August, lord Cutts, with 400 English and Dutch grenadiers, attacked the saillant-angle of a demi-bastion, and lodged himself on the second counterscarp: the breaches being now practicable, and preparations made for a general assault, count Guiscard, the governor, capitulated for the town on the fourth of August; and the French retired into the citadel, against which twelve batteries played on the thirteenth: the trenches, meanwhile, were carried on with great expedition, notwithstanding all the efforts of the besieged, who fired without ceasing, and exerted amazing diligence and intrepidity in defending and repairing the damage they sustained: at length, the annoyance became so dreadful from the unintermitting showers of bombs and red-hot bullets, that Boufflers, after having made divers furious sallies, formed a scheme for breaking through the confederate camp with his cavalry: this, however, was prevented by the extreme vigilance of king William.

15. After the bombardment of Brussels, Villeroy, being reinforced with all the troops that could be drafted from garrisons, advanced towards Namur, with an army of 90,000 men; and prince Vaudemont being joined by the prince of Hesse, with a strong body of forces from the Rhine, took possession of the strong camp at Masy, within five English miles of the besieging army: the king, understanding that the enemy had reached Fleurus, where they discharged ninety pieces of cannon as a signal to inform the garrison of their approach, left the conduct of the siege to the elector of Bavaria, and took on himself the command of the covering army, in order to oppose Villeroy, who being farther reinforced by a detachment from Germany, declared that he would hazard a battle for the relief of Namur: but when he viewed the posture of the allies near Masy, he changed his resolution, and retired in the night without noise. On the thirtieth of August, the besieged were summoned to surrender by count Horne, who, in a parley with the count de Lamont, general of the French infantry, gave him to understand, that marshal Villeroy had retired towards the Mehaigne; so that the garrison could not expect to be relieved: no immediate answer being returned to this message, the parley was broken off, and the king resolved to proceed without delay to a general assault, which he had already planned with the elector and his other generals. Between one and two in the afternoon, lord Cutts, who desired the command, though it was not his turn of duty, rushed out of the trenches of the second line, at the head of 300 grenadiers, to make a lodgement in the breach of Terranova, supported by the regiments of Coulthorp, Buchan, Hamilton, and Mackay; while colonel Marselly, with a body of Dutch, the Bavarians, and Brandenburgers, attacked at two other places: the assailants met with such a warm reception, that the English grenadiers were repulsed, even after they had mounted the breach, lord Cutts being for some time disabled by a shot in the head: Marselly was defeated, taken, and afterwards killed by a cannon-ball from the batteries of the besiegers: the Bavarians, by mistaking their way, were exposed to a terrible fire, by which their general, count Rivera, and a great number of their officers were slain: nevertheless, they fixed themselves on the outward intrenchment, on the point of the Coehorn next to the Sambre, and maintained their ground with amazing fortitude. Lord Cutts, when his wound was dressed, returned to the scene of action, and ordered 200 chosen men of Mackay's regiment, commanded by lieutenant Cockle, to attack the face of the saillant-angle next to the breach, sword in hand; while the ensigns of the same regiment should advance, and plant their colors on the palisadoes. Cockle and his detachment executed the command he had received with admirable intrepidity: they broke through the palisadoes, drove the French from the covered way, made a lodgement in one of the batteries, and turned the cannon against the enemy: the Bavarians being thus sustained, made their post good: the major-generals La Cave and Schwerin lodged themselves at the same time on the covered way; and though the general assault did not succeed in its full extent, the confederates remained masters of a very considerable lodgement, nearly an English mile in length: yet this was dearly purchased with the lives of 2000 men, including many officers of great rank and reputation. During the action the elector of Bavaria signalled his courage in a very remarkable manner, riding from place to place through the hottest of the fire, giving his directions with notable presence of mind according to the emergency of circumstances, animating the officers with praise and promise of preferment, and distributing handfuls of gold among the private soldiers.

16. On the first of September, the besieged having obtained a cessation of arms, that their dead might be buried, the count de Guiscard, appearing on the breach, desired to speak with the elector of Bavaria: his highness immediately mounting the breach, the French governor offered to surrender the fort of Coehorn; but was given to understand, that if he intended to capitulate, he must treat for the whole: this reply being communicated to Boufflers, he agreed to the proposal; the cessation was prolonged, and that very evening the capitulation was finished. Villeroy, who lay encamped at Gemblours, was no sooner apprised of this event, by a triple discharge of all the artillery, and a running fire along the lines of the confederate army, than he passed the Sambre, near Charleroy, with great precipitation; and having reinforced the garrison of Dinant, retreated towards the lines in the neighborhood of Mons. On the fifth of September, the French garrison, which was now reduced from 15,000 to 5500 men, evacuated the citadel of Namur: Boufflers, in marching out, was arrested in the name of his Britannic majesty, by way of reprisal for the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse, which the French king had detained, contrary to the cartel subsisting between the two nations: the marshal was not a little discomposed at this unexpected incident, and expostulated warmly with Mr. Dyckvelt, who assured him the king of Great Britain entertained a profound respect for his person and character:

William even offered to set him at liberty, provided he would pass his word that the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse should be given back, or that he himself would return in a fortnight: he said, that he could not enter into any such engagement, as he did not know his master's reasons for detaining the garrisons in question: he was, therefore reconveyed to Namur; from thence removed to Maestricht, and treated with great reverence and respect, till the return of an officer whom he had despatched to Versailles with an account of his captivity: then he engaged his word that the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse should be given back to the allied army: he was immediately released, and conducted in safety to Dinant. When he repaired to Versailles, Louis received him with very extraordinary marks of esteem and affection: he embraced him in public with the warmest expressions of regard; declared himself perfectly well satisfied with his conduct; created him a duke and peer of France; and presented him with a very large sum, in acknowledgement of his signal services.

17. After the reduction of Namur, which greatly enhanced the military character of king William, he retired to his house at Loo, which was his favorite place of residence, leaving the command to the elector of Bavaria; and about the latter end of September both armies began to separate. The French forces retired within their lines: a good number of the allied troops were distributed in different garrisons; and a strong detachment marched towards Newport, under the command of the prince of Wirtemberg, for the security of that place. Thus ended the campaign in the Netherlands. On the Rhine nothing of moment was attempted by either army: the marshal de Lorges, in the beginning of June, passed the Rhine at Philipsburg; and, posting himself at Brucksal, sent out parties to ravage the country: on the eleventh of the same month, the prince of Baden joined the German army at Steppach; and on the eighth of July was reinforced by the troops of the other German confederates in the neighborhood of Wiselock: on the nineteenth, the French retired without noise, in the night, towards Mannheim, where they repassed the river, without any interruption from the imperial general: then he sent off a large detachment to Flanders: the same step was taken by the prince of Baden; and each army lay inactive in their quarters for the remaining part of the campaign. The command of the Germans in Hungary was conferred on the elector of Saxony ; but the court of Vienna was so dilatory in their preparations, that he was not in a condition to act till the middle of August : lord Paget had been sent ambassador from England to the Ottoman Porte, with instructions relating to a pacification ; but before he could obtain an audience, the sultan died, and was succeeded by his nephew, Mustapha, who resolved to prosecute the war in person. The warlike genius of this new emperor afforded but an uncomfortable prospect to his people, considering that Peter, the czar of Muscovy, had taken the opportunity of the war in Hungary to invade the Crimea and besiege Azoph ; so that the Tartars were too much employed at home to spare the succors which the sultan demanded : nevertheless, Mustapha and his visir took the field before the imperialists could commence the operations of the campaign ; passed the Danube, took Lippa and Titul by assault, stormed the camp of general Veterani, who was posted at Lugos with 7000 men, and who lost his life in the action : the infantry were cut to pieces, after having made a desperate defence ; but the horse retreated to Carousebes, under the conduct of general Trusches. The Turks, after this exploit, retired to Orsowa : their navy meanwhile surprised the Venetian fleet at Scio, where several ships of the republic were destroyed ; and they recovered that island, which the Venetians thought proper to abandon ; but, in order to balance this misfortune, these last obtained a complete victory over the bashaw of Negropont in the Morea.

18. The French king still maintained a secret negotiation with the duke of Savoy, whose conduct had been for some time mysterious and equivocal. Contrary to the opinion of his allies, he undertook the siege of Casal, which was counted one of the strongest fortifications in Europe, defended by a numerous garrison, abundantly supplied with ammunition and provision : the siege was begun about the middle of May ; and the place was surrendered by capitulation in about fourteen days, to the astonishment of the confederates, who did not know that this was a sacrifice by which the French court obtained the duke's forbearance during the remaining part of the campaign. The capitulation imported, that the place should be restored to the duke of Mantua, who was the rightful proprietor ; that the fortifications should be demolished at the expense of the allies ; that the garrison should remain in the fort till that work should be completed ; and hostages were exchanged for the performance of these conditions: the duke understood the art of procrastination so well, that September was far advanced before the place was wholly dismantled; and then he was seized with an ague, which obliged him to quit the army.

19. In Catalonia the French could hardly maintain the footing they had gained: admiral Russell, who wintered at Cadiz, was created admiral, chief-commander, and captain-general of all his majesty's ships employed, or to be employed in the narrow seas, and in the Mediterranean: he was reinforced by 4500 soldiers, under the command of brigadier-general Stewart; and 7000 men, imperialists as well as Spaniards, were drafted from Italy for the defence of Catalonia: these forces were transported to Barcelona, under the convoy of admiral Nevil, detached by Russell for that purpose. The affairs of Catalonia had already changed their aspect: several French parties had been defeated: the Spaniards had blocked up Ostalric and Castel-Follit: Noailles had been recalled, and the command devolved to the duke de Vendome, who no sooner understood that the forces from Italy were landed, than he dismantled Ostalric and Castel-Follit, and retired to Palamos: the viceroy of Catalonia and the English admiral having resolved to give battle to the enemy, and reduce Palamos, the English troops were landed on the ninth of August, and the allied army advanced to Palamos: the French appeared in order of battle, but the viceroy declined an engagement: far from attacking the enemy, he withdrew his forces, and the town was bombarded by the admiral. The miscarriage of this expedition was in a great measure owing to a misunderstanding between Russell and the court of Spain: the admiral complained that his catholic majesty had made no preparations for the campaign; that he had neglected to fulfil his engagements with respect to the Spanish squadron, which ought to have joined the fleets of England and Holland; that he had taken no care to provide tents and provisions for the British forces: on the twenty-seventh of August he sailed for the coast of Provence, where the fleet was endangered by a terrible tempest: then he steered down the Straits, and towards the latter end of September arrived in the bay of Cadiz: there he left a number of ships under the command of Sir David Mitchel, until he should be joined by Sir George Rooke, who was expected from England; and returned home with the rest of the combined squadrons.

20. While admiral Russell asserted the British dominion in the Mediterranean, the French coasts were again insulted in the channel by a separate fleet, under the command of lord Berkley of Stratton, assisted by the Dutch admiral Allemonde: on the fourth of July they anchored before St. Maloes, which they bombarded from nine ketches covered by some frigates, which sustained more damage than was done to the enemy: on the sixth, Granville underwent the same fate, and then the fleet returned to Portsmouth. The bomb vessels being refitted, the fleet sailed round to the Downs, where 400 soldiers were embarked for an attempt on Dunkirk, under the direction of Meesters, the famous Dutch engineer, who had prepared his infernals, and other machines for the service: on the first of August the experiment was tried without success: the bombs did some execution, but two smoke-ships miscarried: the French had secured the risbank and wooden forts with piles, bombs, chains, and floating batteries, in such a manner, that the machine-vessels could not approach near enough to produce any effect: besides, the councils of the assailants were distracted by violent animosities: the English officers bated Meesters, because he was a Dutchman, and had acquired some credit with the king; he, on the other hand, treated them with disrespect: he retired with his machines in the night, and refused to co-operate with lord Berkley in his design on Calais, which was now put in execution: on the sixteenth he brought his batteries to bear on this place, and set fire to it in different quarters; but the enemy had taken such precautions as rendered his scheme abortive.

21. A squadron had been sent to the West-Indies under the joint command of captain Robert Wilmot and colonel Lilington, with 1200 land forces: they had instructions to co-operate with the Spaniards in Hispaniola against the French settlements on that island, and to destroy their fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland in their return: they were accordingly joined by 1700 Spaniards raised by the president of St. Domingo; but instead of proceeding against Petit-Guavas, according to the directions they had received, Wilmot took possession of Port François, and plundered the country for his own private advantage, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Lilington, who protested against his conduct: in a word, the sea and land officers lived in a state of perpetual dissension; and both became extremely disagreeable to the Spaniards, who soon renounced all connexion with them and their designs. In the beginning of September the commodore set sail for England, and lost one of his ships in the gulf of Florida: he himself died in his passage; and the greater part of the men being swept off by an epidemical distemper, the squadron returned to Britain in a most miserable condition. Notwithstanding the great efforts the nation had made to maintain such a number of different squadrons for the protection of commerce, as well as to annoy the enemy, the trade suffered severely from the French privateers, which swarmed in both channels, and made prize of many rich vessels: the marquis of Carmarthen, being stationed with a squadron off the Scilly islands, mistook a fleet of merchant ships for the Brest fleet, and retired with precipitation to Milford-haven: in consequence of this retreat, the privateers took a good number of ships from Barbadoes, and five from the East-Indies, valued at £1,000,000 sterling: the merchants renewed their clamor against the commissioners of the admiralty, who produced their orders and instructions in their own defence: the marquis of Carmarthen had been guilty of flagrant misconduct on this occasion; but the chief source of those national calamities was the circumstantial intelligence transmitted to France from time to time by the malcontents of England; for they were actuated by a scandalous principle, which they still retain, namely that of rejoicing in the distress of their country.

22. King William, after having conferred with the States of Holland and the elector of Brandenburg, who met him at the Hague, embarked for England on the nineteenth of October, and arrived in safety at Margate, from whence he proceeded to London, where he was received as a conqueror amidst the rejoicings and acclamations of the people: on the same day he summoned a council at Kensington, in which it was determined to convoke a new parliament: while the nation was in good humor, it was supposed that they would return such members only as were well affected to the government; whereas the present parliament might proceed in its inquiries into corruption and other grievances; and be the less influenced by the crown, as their dependence was of such short duration: the parliament was therefore dissolved by proclamation, and a new one summoned to meet at Westminster on the twenty-second of November. While the whole nation was occupied in the elections, William, by the advice of his chief confidants, laid his own disposition under restraint in another effort to acquire popularity: he honored the diversions of Newmarket with his presence, and there received a compliment of congratulation from the university of Cambridge: then he visited the earls of Sunderland, Northampton, and Montagu at their different houses in the country; and proceeded with a splendid retinue to Lincoln, from whence he repaired to Welbeck, a seat belonging to the duke of Newcastle in Nottinghamshire, where he was attended by Dr. Sharp, archbishop of York, and his clergy: he lodged one night with lord Brooke at Warwick-castle, dined with the duke of Shrewsbury at Eyefort, and, by the way of Woodstock, made a solemn entry into Oxford, having been met at some distance from the city by the duke of Ormond, as chancellor of the university, the vice-chancellor, the doctors in their habits, and the magistrates in their formalities: he proceeded directly to the theatre, where he was welcomed in an elegant Latin speech: he received from the chancellor on his knees the usual presents of a large English bible, and book of common-prayer, the cuts of the university, and a pair of gold-fringed gloves: the conduits ran with wine, and a magnificent banquet was prepared; but an anonymous letter being found in the street, importing that there was a design to poison his majesty, William refused to eat or drink in Oxford, and retired immediately to Windsor. Notwithstanding this abrupt departure, which did not savor much of magnanimity, the university chose Sir William Trumbal, secretary of state, as one of their representatives in parliament.

23. The whig interest generally prevailed in the elections, though many even of that party were malcontents; and when the parliament met, Foley was again chosen speaker of the commons. The king, in his first speech, extolled the valor of the English forces; expressed his concern at being obliged to demand such large supplies from his people; observed that the funds had proved very deficient, and the civil list was in a precarious condition; recommended to their compassion the miserable situation of the French protestants; took notice of the bad state of the coin; desired they would form a good bill for the encouragement and increase of seamen, and contrive laws for the advancement of commerce: he mentioned the great preparations which the French were making for taking the field early; entreated them to use despatch; expressed his satisfaction at the choice which his people had made of their representatives in the house of commons ; and exhorted them to proceed with temper and unanimity. Though the two houses presented addresses of congratulation to the king on his late success, and promised to assist him in prosecuting the war with vigor, the nation loudly exclaimed against the intolerable burdens and losses to which they were subjected by a foreign scheme of politics, which, like an unfathomable abyss, swallowed up the wealth and blood of the kingdom : all the king's endeavors to cover the disgusting side of his character had proved ineffectual ; he was still dry, reserved, and forbidding ; and the malcontents inveighed bitterly against his behavior to the princess Anne of Denmark : when the news of Namur's being reduced arrived in England, this lady congratulated him on his success in a dutiful letter, to which he would not deign to send a reply, either by writing or message ; nor had she or her husband been favored with the slightest mark of regard since his return to England. The members in the lower house, who had adopted opposing maxims either from principle or resentment, resolved that the crown should purchase the supplies with some concession in favor of the people : they therefore brought in the so long contested bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason and misprision of treason ; and, considering the critical juncture of affairs, the courtiers were afraid of obstructing such a popular measure : the lords inserted a clause, enacting that a peer should be tried by the whole peerage ; and the commons at once assented to this amendment. The bill provided, that persons indicted for high-treason or misprision of treason should be furnished with a copy of the indictment five days before the trial, and indulged with council to plead in their defence ; that no person should be indicted but on the oaths of two lawful witnesses swearing to overt acts ; that in two or more distinct treasons of divers kinds, alleged in one bill of indictment, one witness to one, and another witness to another, should not be deemed two witnesses ; that no person should be prosecuted for any such crime, unless the indictment be found within three years after the offence committed, except in case of a design to attempt to assassinate or poison the king, where this limitation should not take place ; that persons indicted for treason or misprision of treason should be supplied with copies of the panel of the jurors two days at least before the trial, and have process to compel their witnesses to appear ; that no evidence should be admitted of any overt act not expressly laid in the indictment; that this act should not extend to any impeachment or other proceedings in parliament, nor to any indictment for counterfeiting his majesty's coin, his great seal, privy seal, sign manual, or signet.

24. This important affair being discussed, the commons proceeded to examine the accounts and estimates, and voted above £5,000,000 for the service of the ensuing year. The state of the coin was by this time become such a national grievance as could not escape the attention of parliament. the lords prepared an address to the throne for a proclamation to put a stop to the currency of diminished coin, and to this they desired the concurrence of the commons: the lower house, however, determined to take this affair under their own inspection: they appointed a committee of the whole house to deliberate on the state of the nation with respect to the currency: great opposition was made to a recoinage, which was a measure strenuously recommended and supported by Mr. Montagu, who acted on this occasion by the advice of the great mathematician Sir Isaac Newton. The enemies of this expedient argued, that should the silver coin be called in, it would be impossible to maintain the war abroad, or prosecute foreign trade, inasmuch as the merchant could not pay his bills of exchange, nor the soldier receive his subsistence; that a stop would be put to all mutual payment, and this would produce universal confusion and despair: such a reformation could not be effected without some danger and difficulty; but it was become absolutely necessary, as the evil daily increased, and in a little time must have terminated in national anarchy. After long and vehement debates, the majority resolved to proceed with all possible expedition to a new coinage. Another question arose, whether the new coin in its different denominations should retain the original weight and purity of the old, or the established standard be raised in value: the famous Locke engaged in this dispute against Mr. Lowndes, who proposed that the standard should be raised: the arguments of Mr. Locke were so convincing, that the committee resolved the established standard should be preserved with respect to weight and fineness: they likewise resolved, that the loss accruing to the revenue from clipped money should be borne by the public: in order to prevent a total stagnation, they farther resolved, that after an appointed day, no clipped money should pass in payment, except to the collectors of the revenue and taxes, or on loans or payment into the exchequer; that, after another day to be appointed, no clipped money of any sort should pass in any payment whatsoever; and that a third day should be fixed for all persons to bring in their clipped money to be recoined; after which they should have no allowance on what they might offer: they addressed the king to issue a proclamation agreeably to these resolutions; and on the nineteenth of December it was published accordingly. Such were the fears of the people, augmented and inflamed by the enemies of the government, that all payment immediately ceased, and a face of distraction appeared through the whole community: the adversaries of the bill seized this opportunity to aggravate the apprehensions of the public: they inveighed against the ministry, as the authors of this national grievance; they levelled their satire particularly at Montagu; and it required uncommon fortitude and address to avert the most dangerous consequences of popular discontent: the house of commons agreed to the following resolutions; that £1,200,000 should be raised by a duty on glass windows, to make up the loss on the clipped money; that the recompense for supplying the deficiency of clipped money should extend to all silver coin, though of a coarser alloy than the standard; that the collectors and receivers of his majesty's aids and revenues should be enjoined to receive all such moneys; that a reward of five per cent. should be given to all such persons as should bring in either milled or broad unclipped money, to be applied in exchange of the clipped money throughout the kingdom; that a reward of three pence per ounce should be given to all persons who should bring in wrought plate to the mint to be coined; that persons might pay in their whole next year's land-tax in clipped money at one convenient time to be appointed for that purpose; that commissioners should be appointed in every county, to pay and distribute the milled and broad unclipped money, and the new coined money in lieu of that which was diminished. A bill being prepared agreeably to these determinations, was sent up to the house of lords, who made some amendments, which the commons rejected; but, in order to avoid cavils and conferences, they dropped the bill, and brought in another without the clauses which the lords had inserted: they were again proposed in the upper house, and over-ruled by the majority; and, on the twenty-first of January, the bill received the royal assent, as did another bill, enlarging the time for purchasing annuities, and continuing the duties on low wines : at the same time, the king passed the bill of trials for high-treason and an act to prevent mercenary elections. Divers merchants and traders petitioned the house of commons, that the losses in their trade and payments, occasioned by the rise of guineas, might be taken into consideration : a bill was immediately brought in for taking off the obligation and encouragement for coining guineas for a certain time ; and then the commons proceeded to lower the value of this coin ; a task, in which they met with great opposition from some members, who alleged that it would foment the popular disturbances : at length, however, the majority agreed that a guinea should be lowered from thirty to eight-and-twenty shillings, and afterwards to six-and-twenty : at length a clause was inserted in the bill for encouraging people to bring plate to the mint, settling the price of a guinea at two-and-twenty shillings, and it naturally sunk to its original value of twenty shillings and sixpence : many persons, however, supposing that the price of gold would be raised the next session, hoarded up their guineas ; and, on the same supposition, encouraged by the malcontents, the new-coined silver money was reserved, to the great detriment of commerce : the king ordered mints to be erected in York, Bristol, Exeter, and Chester for the purpose of the recoinage, which was executed with unexpected success ; so that in less than a year the currency of England, which had been the worst, became the best coin in Europe.

25. At this period the attention of the commons was diverted to an object of a more private nature : the earl of Portland, who enjoyed the greatest share of the king's favor, had obtained a grant of some lordships in Derbyshire : while the warrant was depending, the gentlemen of that county resolved to oppose it with all their power. In consequence of a petition, they were indulged with a hearing by the lords of the treasury : Sir William Williams, in the name of the rest, alleged that the lordships in question were the ancient demesnes of the prince of Wales, absolutely unalienable ; that the revenues of those lordships supported the government of Wales, in paying the judges and other salaries ; that the grant was of too large an extent for any foreign subject ; and that the people of the county were too great to be subject to any foreigner : sundry other substantial reasons were used against the grant, which, notwithstanding all their remonstrances, would have passed through the offices, had not the Welsh gentlemen addressed themselves by petition to the house of commons : on this occasion, Mr. Price, a member of the house, harangued with great severity against the Dutch in general ; and did not even abstain from sarcasms on the king's person, title, and government. The objections started by the petitioners being duly considered, were found so reasonable, that the commons presented an address to the king, representing that those manors had been usually annexed to the principality of Wales, and settled on the princes of Wales for their support ; that many persons in those parts held their estates by royal tenure, under great and valuable compositions, rents, royal payments, and services to the crown and princes of Wales, and enjoyed great privileges and advantages under such tenure : they therefore besought his majesty to recall the grant, which was in diminution of the honor and interest of the crown ; and prayed that the said manors and lands might not be alienated without the consent of parliament. This address met with a cold reception from the king, who promised to recall the grant which had given such offence to the commons ; and said he would find some other way of showing his favor to the earl of Portland.

26. The people in general entertained a national aversion to this nobleman : the malcontents inculcated a notion that he had made use of his interest and intelligence to injure the trade of England, that the commerce of his own country might flourish without competition : to his suggestions they imputed the act and patent in favor of the Scottish company, which was supposed to have been thrown in as a bone of contention between the two kingdoms : the subject was first started in the house of lords, who invited the commons to a conference : a committee was appointed to examine into the particulars of the act for erecting the Scottish company ; and the two houses presented a joint address against it, as a scheme that would prejudice all the subjects concerned in the wealth and trade of the English nation. They represented, that, in consequence of the exemption from taxes, and other advantages granted to the Scottish company, that kingdom would become a free port for all East and West-India commodities ; that the Scots would be enabled to supply all Europe at a cheaper rate than the English could afford to sell their merchandise for ; therefore England would lose the benefit of its foreign trade : besides, they observed that the Scots would smuggle their commodities into England, to the great detriment of his majesty and his customs : to this remonstrance the king replied, that he had been ill served in Scotland ; but that he hoped some remedies would be found to prevent the inconveniences of which they were apprehensive : in all probability he had been imposed on by the ministry of that kingdom ; for in a little time he discarded the marquis of Tweeddale, and dismissed both the Scottish secretaries of state, in lieu of whom he appointed lord Murray, son to the marquis of Athol. Notwithstanding the king's answer, the committee proceeded on the inquiry ; and in consequence of their report, confirming a petition from the East-India company, the house resolved that the directors of the Scottish company were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, in administering and taking an oath de fidei in this kingdom ; and that they should be impeached for the same : meanwhile, Roderick Mackenzie, from whom they had received their chief information, began to retract his evidence, and was ordered into custody ; but he made his escape, and could not be retaken, although the king, at their request, issued a proclamation for that purpose. The Scots were extremely incensed against the king, when they understood he had disowned their company, from which they had promised themselves such wealth and advantage : the settlement of Darien was already planned, and afterwards put in execution, though it miscarried in the sequel, and had like to have produced abundance of mischief.

27. The complaints of the English merchants who had suffered by the war were so loud at this juncture, that the commons resolved to take their case into consideration : the house resolved itself into a committee to consider the state of the nation with regard to commerce ; and having duly weighed all circumstances, agreed to the following resolutions : that a council of trade should be established by act of parliament, with powers to take measures for the more effectual preservation of commerce : that the commissioners should be nominated by parliament, but none of them have seats in the house : that they should take an oath, acknowledging the title of king William as rightful and lawful ; and abjuring the pretensions of James, or any other person. The king considered these resolutions as an open attack on his prerogative, and signified his displeasure to the earl of Sunderland, who patronised this measure ; but it was so popular in the house, that in all probability it would have been put in execution, had not the attention of the commons been diverted from it at this period by the detection of a new conspiracy. The friends of king James had, on the death of queen Mary, renewed their practices for effecting a restoration of that monarch, on the supposition that the interest of William was considerably weakened by the decease of his consort: certain individuals, whose zeal for James overshot their discretion, formed a design to seize the person of king William, and convey him to France, or put him to death in case of resistance: they had sent emissaries to the court of St. Germain, to demand a commission for this purpose, which was refused: the earl of Aylesbury, lord Montgomery, son to the marquis of Powis, Sir John Fenwick, Sir John Friend, captain Charnock, captain Porter, and one Mr. Goodman, were the first contrivers of this project: Charnock was detached with a proposal to James, that he should procure a body of horse and foot from France, to make a descent in England; and they would engage not only to join him at his landing, but even to replace him on the throne of England: these offers being declined by James, on pretence that the French king could not spare such a number of troops at that juncture, the earl of Aylesbury went over in person, and was admitted to a conference with Louis, in which the scheme of an invasion was actually concerted. In the beginning of February, the duke of Berwick repaired privately to England, where he conferred with the conspirators, assured them that king James was ready to make a descent with a considerable number of French forces, distributed commissions, and gave directions for providing men, arms, and horses to join him at his arrival: when he returned to France, he found every thing prepared for the expedition: the troops were drawn down to the sea-side; a great number of transports were assembled at Dunkirk; monsieur Gabaret had advanced as far as Calais with a squadron of ships, which, when joined by that of Du Bart at Dunkirk, was judged a sufficient convoy; and James had come as far as Calais in his way to embark. Meanwhile, the Jacobites in England were assiduously employed in making preparations for a revolt: Sir John Friend had very nearly completed a regiment of horse; considerable progress was made in levying another by Sir William Perkins; Sir John Fenwick had enlisted four troops; colonel Tempest had undertaken for one regiment of dragoons; colonel Parker was preferred to the command of another; Mr. Curzon was commissioned for a third; and the malcontents intended to raise a fourth in Suffolk, where their interest chiefly prevailed.

28. While one part of the Jacobites proceeded against William in the usual way of exciting an insurrection; another, consisting of the most desperate conspirators, had formed a scheme of assassination. Sir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, who had served as an officer in the army of James, a man of undaunted courage, a furious bigot in the religion of Rome, yet close, circumspect, and determined, was landed with other officers, in Romney-marsh, by one captain Gill, about the beginning of January, and is said to have undertaken the task of seizing or assassinating king William: he imparted his design to Harrison, alias Johnston, a priest, Charnock, Porter, and Sir William Perkins, by whom it was approved; and he pretended to have a particular commission for this service: after various consultations, they resolved to attack the king on his return from Richmond, where he commonly hunted on Saturdays; and the scene of their intended ambuscade was a lane between Brentford and Turnham-green. As it would be necessary to charge and disperse the guards that attended the coach, they agreed that their number should be increased to forty horsemen, and each conspirator began to engage proper persons for the enterprise: when their complement was full, they determined to execute their purpose on the fifteenth of February: they concerted the manner in which they should meet in small parties without suspicion, and waited with impatience for the hour of action. In this interval, some of the underling actors, seized with horror at the reflection of what they had undertaken, or captivated with the prospect of reward, resolved to prevent the execution of the design by a timely discovery: on the eleventh of February one Fisher informed the earl of Portland of the scheme, and named some of the conspirators; but his account was imperfect; on the thirteenth, however, he returned with a circumstantial detail of all the particulars: next day, the earl was accosted by one Pendergrass, an Irish officer, who told his lordship he had just come from Hampshire, at the request of a particular friend, and understood that he had been called up to town with a view of engaging him in a design to assassinate king William: he said, he had promised to embark in the undertaking, though he detested it in his own mind, and took this first opportunity of revealing the secret, which was of such consequence to his majesty's life: he owned himself a Roman catholic, but declared that he did not think any religion could justify such a treacherous purpose: at the same time, he observed, that as he lay under obligations to some of the conspirators, his honor and gratitude would not permit him to accuse them by name; and that he would on no consideration appear as an evidence. The king had been so much used to fictitious plots and false discoveries, that he paid little regard to the informations, until they were confirmed by the testimony of another conspirator, called La Rue, a Frenchman, who communicated the same particulars to brigadier Levison, without knowing the least circumstance of the other discoveries: then the king believed there was something real in the conspiracy; and Pendergrass and La Rue were severally examined in his presence. He thanked Pendergrass in particular for this instance of his probity; but observed that it must prove ineffectual, unless he would discover the names of the conspirators; for, without knowing who they were, he should not be able to secure his life against their attempts: at length, Pendergrass was prevailed on to give a list of those he knew, yet not before the king had solemnly promised that he should not be used as an evidence against them, except with his own consent. As the king did not go to Richmond on the day appointed, the conspirators postponed the execution of their design till the Saturday following: they accordingly met at different houses on the Friday, when every man received his instructions: there they agreed, that after the perpetration of the parricide, they should ride in a body as far as Hammersmith, and then dispersing, enter London by different avenues; but on the morning, when they understood that the guards were returned to their quarters, and the king's coaches sent back to the Mews, they were seized with a sudden damp, on the suspicion that their plot was discovered: Sir George Barclay withdrew himself, and every one began to think of providing for his own safety: next night, however, a great number of them were apprehended, and then the whole discovery was communicated to the privy-council: a proclamation was issued against those that absconded; and great diligence was used to find Sir George Barclay, who was supposed to have a particular commission from James for assassinating the prince of Orange; but he made good his retreat, and it was never proved that any such commission had been granted.

29. This design and the projected invasion proved equally abortive. James had scarce reached Calais, when the duke of Wirtemberg despatched his aid-de-camp from Flanders to king William, with an account of the purposed descent: expresses with the same tidings arrived from the elector of Bavaria and the prince de Vaudemont: two considerable squadrons being ready for sea, admiral Russell embarked at Spithead, and stood over to the French coast with about fifty sail of the line: the enemy were confounded at his appearance, and hauled in their vessels under the shore in such shallow water that he could not follow and destroy them; but he absolutely ruined their design, by cooping them up in their harbors. King James, after having tarried some weeks at Calais, returned to St. Germain: the forces were sent back to the garrisons from which they had been drafted: the people of France exclaimed that the malignant star which ruled the destiny of James had blasted this and every other project formed for his restoration: by means of the reward offered in the proclamation, the greater part of the conspirators were betrayed or taken: George Harris, who had been sent from France, with orders to obey Sir George Barclay, surrendered himself to Sir William Trumball, and confessed the scheme of assassination in which he had been engaged: Porter and Pendergrass were apprehended together: this last insisted on the king's promise, that he should not be compelled to give evidence; but, when Porter owned himself guilty, the other observed, he was no longer bound to be silent, as his friend had made a confession; and they were both admitted as evidences for the crown.

30. After their examination, the king, in a speech to both houses, communicated the nature of the conspiracy against his life, as well as the advices he had received touching the invasion: he explained the steps he had taken to defeat the double design, and professed his confidence in their readiness and zeal to concur with him in every thing that should appear necessary for their common safety. That same evening the two houses waited on him at Kensington, in a body, with an affectionate address, by which they expressed their abhorrence of the villanous and barbarous design which had been formed against his sacred person, of which they besought him to take more than ordinary care: they assured him they would to the utmost defend his life, and support his government against the late king James and all other enemies; and declared, that, in case his majesty should come to a violent death, they would revenge it on his adversaries and their adherents. He was extremely well pleased with this warm address, and assured them, in his turn, he would take all opportunities of recommending himself to the continuance of their loyalty and affection: the commons forthwith empowered him by bill to secure all persons suspected of conspiring against his person and government: they brought in another, providing, that in case of his majesty's death, the parliament then in being should continue until dissolved by the next heir in succession to the crown, established by act of parliament: that if his majesty should chance to die between two parliaments, that which had been last dissolved should immediately re-assemble, and sit for the despatch of national affairs: they voted an address, to desire that his majesty would banish by proclamation all papists to the distance of ten miles from the cities of London and Westminster, and give instructions to the judges going on the circuits to put the laws in execution against Roman catholics and non-jurors: they drew up an association, binding themselves to assist each other in support of the king and his government, and to revenge any violence that should be committed on his person: this was signed by all the members then present; but, as some had absented themselves on frivolous pretences, the house ordered that in sixteen days the absentees should either subscribe or declare their refusal: several members neglecting to comply with this injunction within the limited time, the speaker was ordered to write to those who were in the country, and demand a peremptory answer; and the clerk of the house attended such as pretended to be ill in town: the absentees, finding themselves pressed in this manner, thought proper to sail with the stream, and sign the association, which was presented to the king by the commons in a body, with a request that it might be lodged among the records in the Tower, as a perpetual memorial of their loyalty and affection. The king received them with uncommon complacency; declared that he heartily entered into the same association; that he should be always ready to venture his life with his good subjects, against all who should endeavor to subvert the religion, laws, and liberties of England; and he promised that this, and all other associations, should be lodged among the records of the Tower of London: next day the commons resolved, that whoever should affirm an association was illegal, should be deemed a promoter of the designs of the late king James, and an enemy to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. The lords followed the example of the lower house in drawing up an association; but the earl of Nottingham, Sir Edward Seymour, and Mr. Finch objected to the words 'rightful and lawful,' as applied to his majesty: they said, as the crown and its prerogatives were vested in him, they would yield obedience, though they could not acknowledge him as their rightful and lawful king: nothing could be more absurd than this distinction, started by men who had actually constituted part of the administration; unless they supposed that the right of king William expired with queen Mary: the earl of Rochester proposed an expedient in favor of such tender consciences, by altering the words that gave offence; and this was adopted accordingly: fifteen of the peers and ninety-two commoners signed the association with reluctance; it was, however, subscribed by all sorts of people in different parts of the kingdom; and the bishops drew up a form for the clergy, which was signed by a great majority.<sup>19</sup> The commons brought in a bill, declaring all men incapable of public trust, or of sitting in parliament, who would not engage in this association: at the same time, the council issued an order for renewing all the commissions in England, that those who had not signed it voluntarily should be dismissed from the service as disaffected persons.

31. After these warm demonstrations of loyalty, the commons proceeded on ways and means for raising the supplies. A new bank was constituted as a fund, on which the sum of £564,000 should be raised; and it was called the land-bank, because established on land securities [1696.]. This scheme, said to have been projected by the famous Dr. Chamberlain, was patronised by the earl of Sunderland, and managed by Foley and Harley; so that it seemed to be a tory plan which Sunderland supported, in order to reconcile himself to that party.<sup>20</sup> The bank of England petitioned

<sup>20</sup> The commons resolved, that a fund redeemable by parliament be settled in a national land-bank, to be raised by new subscriptions; that no persons be concerned in both banks at the same time; that the duties on coal, culm, and tonnage of ships, be taken off from the seventeenth of March; that the sum of £2,564,000 be raised on this perpetual fund, redeemable by parliament; that the new bank should be restrained from lending money but on land securities, or to the government in the ex-

against this bill, and were heard by their counsel; but their representations produced no effect; and the bill, having passed through both houses, received the royal assent. On the twenty-seventh of April the king closed the session with a short but gracious speech; and the parliament was prorogued to the sixteenth of June.

32. Before this period some of the conspirators had been brought to trial. The first who suffered was Robert Charnock, one of the two fellows of Magdalen-college, who, in the reign of James, had renounced the protestant religion; the next were lieutenant King, and Thomas Keys, which last had been formerly a trumpeter, but of late servant to captain Porter: they were found guilty of high-treason, and executed at Tyburn: they delivered papers to the sheriff, in which they solemnly declared that they had never seen or heard of any commission from king James for assassinating the prince of Orange: Charnock, in particular, observed, chequer; that for making up the fund of interest for the capital stock, certain duties on glass wares, stone, and earthen bottles, granted before to the king for a term of years, be continued to his majesty, his heirs, and successors; that a farther duty be laid on stone and earthen-ware, and another on tobacco-pipes. This bank was to lend out £500,000 a year on land-securities, at 3l. 10s. per cent. per annum, and to cease and determine, unless the subscription should be full by the first of August next ensuing.

The most remarkable laws enacted in this session were these: an act for voiding all the elections of parliament-men, at which the elected had been at any expense in meat, drink, or money, to procure votes; another against unlawful and double returns; a third, for the more easy recovery of small tithes; a fourth, to prevent marriages without license or bans; a fifth, for enabling the inhabitants of Wales to dispose of all their personal estates as they should think fit: this law was in bar of a custom that had prevailed in that country: the widows and younger children claimed a share of the effects, called the reasonable part, although the effects had been otherwise disposed of by will or deed. The parliament likewise passed an act, for preventing the exportation of wool, and encouraging the importation thereof from Ireland; an act for encouraging the linen manufactures of Ireland; an act for regulating juries; an act for encouraging the Greenland trade; an act of indulgence to the quakers, that their solemn affirmation should be accepted instead of an oath; and an act for continuing certain other acts that were near expiring. Another bill had passed for the better regulating elections for members of parliament; but the royal assent was denied: the question was put in the house of commons, that whosoever advised his majesty not to give his assent to that bill was an enemy to his country; but it was rejected by a great majority.

that he had received frequent assurances of the king's having rejected such proposals when they had been offered ; and that there was no other commission but that for levying war in the usual form. Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins were tried in April : the first, from mean beginnings, had acquired great wealth and credit, and always firmly adhered to the interest of king James : the other was likewise a man of fortune, violently attached to the same principles, though he had taken the oaths to the present government, as one of the six clerks in chancery. Porter, and Blair, another evidence, deposed that Sir John Friend had been concerned in levying men under a commission from king James ; and that he knew of the assassination-plot, though not engaged in it as a personal actor. He endeavored to invalidate the testimony of Blair, by proving him guilty of the most shocking ingratitude : he observed, that both the evidences were reputed papists : the curate of Hackney, who officiated as chaplain in the prisoner's house, declared on oath that after the revolution he used to pray for king William ; and that he had often heard Sir John Friend say, that though he could not comply with the present government, he would live peaceably under it, and never engage in any conspiracy : Mr. Hoadley, father of the present bishop of Winchester, added, that the prisoner was a good protestant, and frequently expressed his detestation of king-killing principles. Friend himself owned he had been with some of the conspirators at a meeting in Leadenhall-street, but heard nothing of raising men, or any design against the government : he likewise affirmed, that a consultation to levy war was not treason ; and that his being at a treasonable consult could amount to no more than a misprision of treason. Lord chief-justice Holt declared, that although a bare conspiracy, or design to levy war, was not treason within the statute of Edward III. yet if the design or conspiracy be to kill, or depose, or imprison the king, by the means of levying war, then the consultation and conspiracy to levy war becomes high-treason, though no war be actually levied. The same inference might have been drawn against the authors and instruments of the revolution. The judge's explanation influenced the jury, who, after some deliberation, found the prisoner guilty. Next day Sir William Perkins was brought to the bar, and on the testimony of Porter, Ewebank, his own groom, and Haywood, a notorious informer, was convicted of having been concerned, not only in the invasion, but also in the design against the king's life: the evidence was scanty, and the prisoner, having been bred to the law, made an artful and vigorous defence; but the judge acted as counsel for the crown; and the jury decided by the hints they received from the bench: he and Sir John Friend underwent the sentence of death, and suffered at Tyburn on the third of April. Friend protested before God, that he knew of no immediate descent purposed by king James, and therefore had made no preparations; that he was utterly ignorant of the assassination scheme; that he died in the communion of the church of England, and laid down his life cheerfully in the cause for which he suffered: Perkins declared, on the word of a dying man, that the tenor of the king's commission, which he saw, was general, directed to all his loving subjects, to raise and levy war against the prince of Orange and his adherents, and to seize all forts, castles, &c. but that he neither saw nor heard of any commission particularly levelled against the person of the prince of Orange: he owned, however, that he was privy to the design, but believed it was known to few or none but the immediate undertakers. These two criminals were in their last moments attended by Collier, Snatt, and Cook, three nonjuring clergymen, who absolved them in the view of the populace with an imposition of hands: a public insult on the government, which did not pass unnoticed: those three clergymen were presented by the grand jury, for having countenanced the treason by absolving the traitors, and thereby encouraged other persons to disturb the peace of the kingdom: an indictment being preferred against them, Cook and Snatt were committed to Newgate; but Collier absconded, and published a vindication of their conduct, in which he affirmed that the imposition of hands was the general practice of the primitive church: on the other hand, the two metropolitans and twelve other bishops subscribed a declaration, condemning the administration of absolution without a previous confession made and abhorrence expressed by the prisoners of the heinous crimes for which they suffered.

In the course of the same month, Rookwood, Cranborne, and Lowick were tried as conspirators, by a special commission, in the king's-bench; and convicted on the joint testimony of Porter, Harris, La Rue, Bertram, Fisher, and Pendergrass. Some favorable circumstances appeared in the case of Lowick: the proof of his having been concerned in the design against the king's life was very defective ; many persons of reputation declared he was an honest, good-natured, inoffensive man ; and he himself concluded his defence with the most solemn protestation of his own innocence : great intercession was made for his pardon by some noblemen ; but all their interest proved ineffectual. Cranborne died in a transport of indignation, leaving a paper which the government thought proper to suppress : Lowick and Rookwood likewise delivered declarations to the sheriff, the contents of which, as being less inflammatory, were allowed to be published : both solemnly denied any knowledge of a commission from king James to assassinate the prince of Orange ; the one affirming that he was incapable of granting such an order ; and the other asserting that he, the best of kings, had often rejected proposals of that nature. Lowick owned that he would have joined the king at his landing ; but declared, he had never been concerned in any bloody affair during the whole course of his life : on the contrary, he said, he had endeavored to prevent bloodshed as much as lay in his power ; and that he would not kill the most miserable creature in the world, even though such an act would save his life, restore his sovereign, and make him one of the greatest men in England. Rookwood alleged, he was engaged by his immediate commander, whom he thought it was his duty to obey, though the service was much against his judgment and inclination : he professed his abhorrence of treachery even to an enemy : he forgave all mankind, even the prince of Orange, who as a soldier, he said, ought to have considered his case before he signed his death-warrant : he prayed God would open his eyes, and render him sensible of the blood that was from all parts crying against him ; so as he might avert a heavier execution than that which he now ordered to be inflicted. The next person brought to trial, was Mr. Cooke, son of Sir Miles Cooke, one of the six clerks in chancery : Porter and Goodman deposed, that he had been present at two meetings at the King's-head tavern in Leadenhall-street, with the lords Aylesbury and Montgomery, Sir William Perkins, Sir John Fenwick, Sir John Friend, Charnock, and Porter. The evidence of Goodman was invalidated by the testimony of the landlord and two drawers belonging to the tavern, who swore that Goodman was not here while the noblemen were present : the prisoner himself solemnly protested that he was ever averse to the introduction of foreign forces ; that he did not so much as hear of the intended invasion, until it became the common topic of conversation; and that he had never seen Goodman at the King's-head: he declared his intention of receiving the blessed sacrament, and wished he might perish in the instant if he now spoke untruth: no respect was paid to these asseverations: the solicitor-general Hawles and lord chief-justice Treby, treated him with great severity in the prosecution and charge to the jury, by whom he was capitally convicted: after his condemnation the court agents tampered with him to make farther discoveries; and after his fate had been protracted by divers short reprieves, he was sent into banishment. From the whole tenor of these discoveries and proceedings, it appears that James had actually meditated an invasion; that his partisans in England had made preparations for joining him on his arrival; that a few desperados of that faction had concerted a scheme against the life of king William; that in prosecuting the conspirators, the court had countenanced informers; that the judges had strained the law, wrested circumstances, and even deviated from the function of their office, to convict the prisoners; in a word, that the administration had used the same arbitrary and unfair practices against those unhappy people, which they themselves had in the late reigns numbered among the grievances of the kingdom.

33. The warmth, however, manifested on this occasion may have been owing to national resentment of the purposed invasion: certain it is, the two houses of parliament and the people in general were animated with extraordinary indignation against France at this juncture: the lords besought his majesty, in a solemn address, to appoint a day of thanksgiving to Almighty God, for having defeated the barbarous purpose of his enemies; and this was observed with uncommon zeal and devotion. Admiral Russell, leaving a squadron for observation on the French coast, returned to the Downs; but Sir Cloudesley Shovel, being properly prepared for the expedition, subjected Calais to another bombardment, by which the town was set on fire in different parts, and the inhabitants were overwhelmed with consternation: the generals of the allied army in Flanders resolved to make some immediate retaliation on the French for their unmanly design on the life of king William, as they took it for granted that Louis was accessory to the scheme of assassination: that monarch, on the supposition that a powerful diversion would be made by the descent on England, had established a vast magazine at Givet, designing, when the allies should be enfeebled by the absence of the British troops, to strike some stroke of importance early in the campaign : on this the confederates now determined to wreak their vengeance. In the beginning of March the earl of Athlone and Monsieur de Coehorn, with the concurrence of the duke of Holstein-Ploen, who commanded the allies, sent a strong detachment of horse, drafted from Brussels and the neighboring garrisons, to amuse the enemy on the side of Charleroy, while they assembled forty squadrons, thirty battalions, with fifteen pieces of cannon, and six mortars, in the territory of Namur : Athlone, with part of this body, invested Dinant, while Coehorn, with the remainder, advanced to Givet : he forthwith began to batter and bombard the place, which in three hours was on fire, and by four in the afternoon wholly destroyed, with the great magazine it contained : then the two generals, joining their forces, returned to Namur without interruption. Hitherto the republic of Venice had deferred acknowledging king William ; but now they sent an extraordinary embassy for that purpose, consisting of Signors Soranzo and Venier, who arrived in London, and on the first of May had a public audience : the king, on this occasion, knighted Soranzo as the senior ambassador, and presented him with the sword according to custom : on that day, too, William declared in council, that he had appointed the same regency which had governed the kingdom during his last absence ; and, embarking on the seventh at Margate, arrived at Orange-Polder in the evening, under convoy of vice-admiral Aylmer : this officer had been ordered to attend with a squadron, as the famous Du Bart still continued at Dunkirk, and some attempt of importance was apprehended from his enterprising genius.<sup>1</sup>

34. The French had taken the field before the allied army could be assembled ; but no transaction of consequence distinguished this campaign, either on the Rhine or in Flanders : the scheme of Louis was still defensive on the side of the Netherlands, while the active plans of king William were defeated for want of money: all the funds for this year proved defective: the land-bank failed, and the national bank sustained a rude shock in its credit: the loss of the nation on the recoinage amounted to £2,200,000; and though the different mints were employed without interruption, they could not for some months supply the circulation, especially as great part of the new money was kept up by those who received it in payment, or disposed of it at an unreasonable advantage. The French king, having exhausted the wealth and patience of his subjects, and greatly diminished their number in the course of this war, began to be diffident of his arms, and employed all the arts of private negociation: while his minister D'Avaux pressed the king of Sweden to offer his mediation, he sent Callieres to Holland, with proposals for settling the preliminaries of a treaty: he took it for granted, that as the Dutch were a trading people, whose commerce had greatly suffered in the war, they could not be averse to a pacification; and he instructed his emissaries to tamper with the malcontents of the republic, especially with the remains of the Louvestein faction, which had always opposed the schemes of the stadtholder. Callieres met with a favorable reception from the States, which began to treat with him about the preliminaries, though not without the consent and concurrence of king William and the rest of the allies. Louis, with a view to quicken the effect of this negociation, pursued offensive measures in Catalonia, where his general, the duke de Vendome, attacked and worsted the Spaniards in their camp near Ostalrick, though the action was not decisive; for that general was obliged to retreat, after having made vigorous efforts against their intrenchments. On the twentieth of June, marshal de Lorges passed the Rhine at Philipsburg, and encamped within a league of Eppingen, where the imperial troops were obliged to intrench themselves under the command of the prince of Baden, as they were not yet joined by the auxiliary forces: the French general, after having faced him about a month, thought proper to repass the river: then he detached a body of horse to Flanders, and cantoned the rest of his troops at Spires, Franckendahl, Worms, and Ostofen: on the last of August the prince of Baden retaliated the insult, by passing the Rhine at Mentz and Cocsheim: on the tenth he was joined by general Thungen, who commanded a separate body, together with the militia of Suabia and Franconia, and advanced to the camp of the enemy, who had re-assembled ; but they were posted in such a manner that he would not hazard an attack : having therefore cannonaded them for some days, scoured the adjacent country by detached parties, and taken the little castle of Wiezengen, he repassed the river at Worms on the seventh of October ; the French likewise crossed at Philipsburg in hopes of surprising general Thungen, who had taken post in the neighborhood of Strasburg ; but he retired to Eppingen before their arrival, and in a little time both armies were distributed in winter-quarters. Peter, the czar of Muscovy, carried on the siege of Azoph with such vigor, that the garrison was obliged to capitulate, after the Russians had defeated a great convoy sent to its relief : the court of Vienna forthwith engaged in an alliance with the Muscovite emperor ; but they did not exert themselves in taking advantage of the disaster which the Turks had undergone : the imperial army, commanded by the elector of Saxony, continued inactive on the river Marosch till the nineteenth of July ; then they made a feint of attacking Temiswaer ; but they marched towards Betzkerch, in their route to Belgrade, on receiving advice that the grand signor intended to besiege Titul. On the twenty-first of August the two armies were in sight of each other : the Turkish horse attacked the imperialists in a plain near the river Begue, but were repulsed : the Germans next day made a show of retreating, in hopes of drawing the enemy from their intrenchments : the stratagem succeeded : on the twenty-sixth, the Turkish army was in motion : a detachment of the imperialists attacked them in flank, as they marched through a wood ; a very desperate action ensued, in which the generals Heusler and Poland, with many other gallant officers, lost their lives : at length, the Ottoman horse were routed ; but the Germans were so roughly handled, that on the second day after the engagement they retreated at midnight, and the Turks remained quiet in their intrenchments.

35. In Piedmont the face of affairs underwent a strange alteration : the duke of Savoy, who had for some time been engaged in a secret negotiation with France, at length embraced the offers of that crown, and privately signed a separate treaty of peace at Loretto, to which place he repaired on a pretended pilgrimage : the French king engaged to present him with 4,000,000 of livres, by way of reparation for the damage he had sustained ; to assist him with a certain number of auxiliaries against all his enemies ; and to effect a marriage between the duke of Burgundy and the princess of Piedmont as soon as the parties should be marriageable : the treaty was guaranteed by the pope and the Venetians, who were extremely desirous of seeing the Germans driven out of Italy. King William, being apprised of this negociation, communicated the intelligence to the earl of Galway, his ambassador at Turin, who expostulated with the duke on this defection : but he persisted in denying any such correspondence, until the advance of the French army enabled him to avow it, without fearing the resentment of the allies whom he had abandoned. Catinat marched into the plains of Turin, at the head of 50,000 men ; an army greatly superior to that of the confederates : then the duke imparted to the ministers of the allies the proposals which France had made ; represented the superior strength of her army ; the danger to which he was exposed ; and finally his inclination to embrace her offers : on the twelfth of July a truce was concluded for a month, and afterwards prolonged till the fifteenth of September : he wrote to all the powers engaged in the confederacy, except king William, expatiating on the same topics, and soliciting their consent : though each in particular refused to concur, he on the twenty-third of August signed the treaty in public, which he had before concluded in private. The emperor was no sooner informed of his design, than he took every step which he thought could divert him from his purpose : he sent the count Mansfelt to Turin, with proposals for a match between the king of the Romans and the princess of Savoy, as well as with offers to augment his forces and his subsidy ; but the duke had already settled his terms with France, from which he would not recede. Prince Eugene, though his kinsman, expressed great indignation at his conduct : the young prince de Commercy was so provoked at his defection, that he challenged him to single combat, and the duke accepted of his challenge ; but the quarrel was compromised by the intervention of friends, and they parted in an amicable manner. He had concealed the treaty until he should receive the remaining part of the subsidies due to him from the confederates : a considerable sum had been remitted from England to Genoa for his use ; but lord Galway no sooner received intimation of his new engagement, than he put a stop to the payment of this money, which he employed in the Milanese, for the subsistence of those troops that were in the British service. King William was encamped at Gemblours when the duke's envoy notified the separate peace which his master had concluded with the king of France : though he was extremely chagrined at the information, he dissembled his anger, and listened to the minister without the least emotion : one of the conditions of this treaty was, that within a limited time the allies should evacuate the duke's dominions, otherwise they should be expelled by the joint forces of France and Savoy : a neutrality was offered to the confederates ; and this being rejected, the contracting powers resolved to attack the Milanese : accordingly, when the truce expired, the duke, as generalissimo of the French king, entered that duchy, and undertook the siege of Valentia ; so that in one campaign he commanded two contending armies : the garrison of Valentia, consisting of 7000 men, Germans, Spaniards, and French protestants, made an obstinate defence ; and the duke of Savoy prosecuted the siege with uncommon impetuosity : but, after the trenches had been opened for thirteen days, a courier arrived from Madrid, with an account of his catholic majesty's having agreed to the neutrality for Italy : this agreement imported, that there should be a suspension of arms until a general peace could be effected, and that the imperial and French troops should return to their respective countries. Christendom had well nigh been embroiled anew by the death of John Sobieski, king of Poland, who died at the age of seventy, in the course of this summer, after having survived his faculties and reputation : as the crown was elective, a competition arose for the succession : the kingdom was divided by factions ; and the different powers of Europe interested themselves warmly in the contention.

36. Nothing of consequence had been lately achieved by the naval force of England. When the conspiracy was first discovered, Sir George Rooke had received orders to return from Cadiz ; and he arrived in the latter end of April : while he took his place at the board of admiralty, lord Berkley succeeded to the command of the fleet ; and in the month of June set sail towards Ushant in order to insult the coast of France : he pillaged and burned the villages on the islands Grouais, Houat, and Heydic ; made prize of about twenty vessels ; bombarded St. Martins on the isle of Rhé, and the town of Olonne, which was set on fire in fifteen different places with the shells and carcasses. Though these appear to have been enterprises of small import, they certainly kept the coast of France in perpetual alarm: the ministry of that kingdom were so much afraid of invasion, that between Brest and Goulet they ordered above 100 batteries to be erected, and above 60,000 men were continually in arms for the defence of the maritime places: in the month of May, rear-admiral Benbow sailed with a small squadron, in order to block up Du Bart in the harbor of Dunkirk; but that famous adventurer found means to escape in a fog, and steering to the eastward, attacked the Dutch fleet in the Baltic, under a convoy of five frigates. These last he took, together with half the number of the trading ships; but, falling in with the outward-bound fleet, convoyed by thirteen ships of the line, he was obliged to burn four of the frigates, turn the fifth adrift, and part with all his prizes, except fifteen, which he carried into Dunkirk.

37. The parliament of Scotland met on the eighth of September; and lord Murray, secretary of state, now earl of Tullibardine, presided as king's commissioner. Though that kingdom was exhausted by the war, and two successive bad harvests, which had driven a great number of the inhabitants into Ireland, there was no opposition to the court measures: the members of parliament signed an association like that of England: they granted a supply of £120,000 for maintaining their forces by sea and land: they passed an act for securing their religion, lives, and properties, in case his majesty should come to an untimely death: by another, they obliged all persons in public trust to sign the association; and then the parliament was adjourned to the eighth of December. The disturbances of Ireland seemed now to be intirely appeased: lord Capel dying in May, the council, by virtue of an act passed in the reign of Henry VIII. elected the chancellor, Sir Charles Porter, to be lord justice and chief governor of that kingdom until his majesty's pleasure should be known: the parliament met in June: the commons expelled Mr. Sanderson, the only member of that house who had refused to sign the association, and adjourned to the fourth of August: by that time Sir Charles Porter, and the earls of Monrath and Drogheda, were appointed lords justices, and signified the king's pleasure that they should adjourn: in the beginning of December the chancellor died of an apoplexy.

38. King William, being tired of an inactive campaign, left the army under the command of the elector of Bavaria, and about the latter end of August repaired to his palace at Loo, where he enjoyed his favorite exercise of stag-hunting; he visited the court of Brandenburg at Cleves; conferred with the States of Holland at the Hague; and, embarking for England, landed at Margate on the sixth of October. The domestic economy of the nation was extremely perplexed at this juncture, from the sinking of public credit, and the stagnation that necessarily attended a recoinage: these grievances were with difficulty removed by the clear apprehension, the enterprising genius, the unshaken fortitude of Mr. Montagu, chancellor of the exchequer, operating on the national spirit of adventure, which the moneyed interest had produced. The king opened the session of parliament on the twentieth of October, with a speech, importing that overtures had been made for a negociation; but that the best way of treating with France would be sword in hand: he therefore desired they would be expeditious in raising the supplies for the service of the ensuing year, as well as for making good the funds already granted: he declared that the civil list could not be supported without their assistance: he recommended the miserable condition of the French protestants to their compassion: he desired they would contrive the best expedients for the recovery of the national credit: he observed, that unanimity and despatch were now more than ever necessary for the honor, safety, and advantage of England. The commons having taken this speech into consideration, resolved that they would support his majesty and his government, and assist him in the prosecution of the war; that the standard of gold and silver should not be altered; and that they would make good all parliamentary funds: then they presented an address in a very spirited strain, declaring, that notwithstanding the blood and treasure of which the nation had been drained, the commons of England would not be diverted from their firm resolutions of obtaining by war a safe and honorable peace: they, therefore, renewed their assurances, that they would support his majesty against all his enemies at home and abroad: the house of lords delivered another to the same purpose, declaring that they would never be wanting or backward, on their parts, in what might be necessary to his majesty's honor, the good of his kingdoms, and the quiet of christendom: the commons, in the first transports of their zeal, ordered two seditious pamphlets to be burned by the hands of the common hangman: they deliberated on the estimates, and granted above £6,000,000 for the service of the ensuing year: they resolved that a supply should be granted for making good the deficiency of parliamentary funds, and appropriated several duties for this purpose.

39. With respect to the coin, they brought in a bill, repealing an act for taking off the obligation and encouragement of coining guineas for a certain time, and for importing and coining guineas and half guineas; as the extravagant price of those coins, which occasioned this act, was now fallen: they passed a second bill for remedying the ill state of the coin; and a third explaining an act in the preceding session, for laying duties on low wines and spirits of the first extraction. In order to raise the supplies of the year, they resolved to tax all persons according to the true value of their real and personal estates, their stock on land and in trade, their income by offices, pensions, and professions: a duty of one penny per week, for one year, was laid on all persons not receiving alms: a farther imposition of one farthing in the pound per week was fixed on all servants receiving four pounds per annum, as wages, and upwards, to eight pounds a year inclusive: those who received from eight to sixteen pounds were taxed at one halfpenny per pound: an aid of three shillings in the pound for one year was laid on all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, according to their true value. Without specifying the particulars of those impositions, we shall only observe, that in the general charge, the commons did not exempt one member of the commonwealth that could be supposed able to bear any part of the burden: provision was made, that hammered money should be received in payment of these duties, at the rate of five shillings and eightpence per ounce: all the deficiencies on annuities and moneys borrowed on the credit of the exchequer were transferred to this aid: the treasury was enabled to borrow £1,500,000 at eight per cent. and to circulate exchequer-bills to the amount of as much more: to cancel these debts, the surplus of all the supplies, except the three-shilling aid, was appropriated. The commons voted £125,000 for making good the deficiency in recoinning the hammered money, and the recompense for bringing in plate to the mint: this sum was raised by a tax or duty on wrought plate, paper, pasteboard, vellum, and parchment, made or imported: taking into consideration the services, and the present languishing state of the bank, whose notes were at twenty per cent. discount, they resolved that it should be enlarged by new subscriptions, made by four-fifths in talleys struck on parliamentary funds, and one-fifth in bank-bills or notes: that effectual provision should be made by parliament for paying the principal of all such talleys, as should be subscribed in the bank, out of the funds agreed to be continued: that an interest of eight per cent. should be allowed on all such talleys, and that the continuance of the bank should be prolonged to the first of August, in the year 1710: that all assignments of orders on talleys subscribed into the bank, should be registered in the exchequer: that, before the day should be fixed for the beginning of the new subscriptions, the old should be made 100 per cent. and what might exceed that value should be divided among the old members: that all the interest due on those talleys which might be subscribed in the bank-stock, at that time appointed for subscriptions, to the end of the last preceding quarter on each tally, should be allowed as principal: that liberty should be given by parliament to enlarge the number of bank-bills, to the value of the sum that should be so subscribed, over and above the £1,200,000, provided they should be obliged to answer such bills and demands, and, in default thereof, be answered by the exchequer out of the first money due to them: that no other bank should be erected or allowed by act of parliament during the continuance of the bank of England: that this should be exempted from all tax or imposition: that no act of the corporation should forfeit the particular interest of any person concerned therein: that provision should be made to prevent the officers of the exchequer, and all other officers and receivers of the revenue, from diverting, delaying, or obstructing the course of payments to the bank: that care should be taken to prevent the altering, counterfeiting, or forging any bank-bills or notes: that the estate and interest of each member in the stock of the corporation should be made a personal estate: that no contract made for any bank-stock to be bought or sold should be valid in law or equity, unless actually registered in the bank books within seven days, and actually transferred within fourteen days after the contract should be made. A bill on these resolutions was brought in, under the direction of the chancellor of the exchequer: it related to the continuance of tonnage and poundage on wine, vinegar, and tobacco; and comprehended a clause for laying an additional duty on salt for tw/c

years and three quarters : all the several branches constituted a general fund, since known by the name of the general mortgage, without prejudice to their former appropriations : the bill also provided, that the talleys should bear eight per cent. interest ; that from the tenth of June for five years they should bear no more than six per cent. interest ; and that no premium or discount on them should be taken : in case of the general fund's proving insufficient to pay the whole interest, it was provided that every proprietor should receive his proportion of the product, and the deficiency be made good from the next aid ; but should the fund produce more than the interest, the surplus was destined to operate as a sinking fund for the discharge of the principal. In order to make up a deficiency of above £800,000, occasioned by the failure of the land-bank, additional duties were laid on leather : the time was enlarged for persons to come in and purchase the annuities payable by several former acts, and to obtain more certain interest in such annuities.

40. Never were more vigorous measures taken to support the credit of the government, and never was the government served by such a set of enterprising undertakers. The commons, having received a message from the king touching the condition of the civil list, resolved, that a sum not exceeding £515,000 should be granted for the support of the civil list for the ensuing year, to be raised by a malt-tax, and additional duties on mum, sweets, cider and perry : they likewise resolved, that an additional aid of one shilling in the pound should be laid on land, as an equivalent for the duty of ten per cent. on mixed goods : provision was made for raising £1,400,000 by a lottery : the treasury was empowered to issue an additional number of exchequer-bills, to the amount of £1,200,000, every £100 bearing interest at the rate of five-pence a day, and ten per cent. for circulation : finally in order to liquidate the transport debt, which the funds established for that purpose had not been sufficient to defray, a money-bill was brought in, to oblige pedlers and hawkers to take out licenses, and pay for them at certain stated prices. One cannot without astonishment reflect on the prodigious efforts that were made on this occasion, or consider without indignation the enormous fortunes that were raised by usurers and extortioners from the distresses of their country : the nation did not seem to know its own strength until it was put to this extraordinary trial ; and the experiment of mortgaging funds succeeded so well, that later ministers have proceeded in the same system, imposing burden on burden, as if they thought the sinews of the nation could never be overstrained.

41. The public credit being thus bolstered up by the singular address of Mr. Montagu, and the bills passed for the supplies of the ensuing year, the attention of the commons was transferred to the case of Sir John Fenwick, who had been apprehended in the month of June at New Romney, in his way to France: he had, when taken, written a letter to his lady by one Webber, who accompanied him; but this man being seized, the letter was found, containing such a confession as plainly evinced him guilty: he then entered into a treaty with the court for turning evidence, and delivered a long information in writing, which was sent abroad to his majesty: he made no discoveries that could injure any of the Jacobites, who, by his account, and other concurring testimonies, appeared to be divided into two parties, known by the names of compounders and non-compounders: the first, headed by the earl of Middleton, insisted on receiving security from king James, that the religion and liberties of England should be preserved; whereas, the other party, at the head of which was the earl of Melfort, resolved to bring him in without conditions, relying on his own honor and generosity. King William having sent over an order for bringing Fenwick to trial, unless he should make more material discoveries, the prisoner, with a view to amuse the ministry, until he could take other measures for his own safety, accused the earls of Shrewsbury, Marlborough, and Bath, the lord Godolphin, and admiral Russell, of having made their peace with king James, and engaged to act for his interest: meanwhile his lady and relations tampered with the two witnesses, Porter and Goodman: the first of these discovered those practices to the government; and one Clancey, who acted as agent for lady Fenwick, was tried, convicted of subornation, fined, and set in the pillory: but they had succeeded better in their attempts on Goodman, who disappeared; so that one witness only remained, and Fenwick began to think his life was out of danger. Admiral Russell acquainted the house of commons, that he and several persons of quality had been reflected on in some informations of Sir John Fenwick; he therefore desired that he might have an opportunity to justify his own character: Mr. secretary Trumball produced the papers, which having been read, the commons ordered that Sir John Fenwick should be brought to the bar of the house: there he was exhorted by the speaker to make an ample discovery; which, however, he declined, except with the proviso that he should first receive some security that what he might say should not prejudice himself: he was ordered to withdraw until they should have deliberated on his request: then he was called in again, and the speaker told him he might deserve the favor of the house by making a full discovery: he desired he might be indulged with a little time to recollect himself, and promised to obey the command of the house: this favor being denied, he again insisted on having security; which they refusing to grant, he chose to be silent, and was dismissed from the bar. The house voted, that his informations, reflecting on the fidelity of several noblemen, members of the house, and others on hearsay, were false and scandalous, contrived to undermine the government, and create jealousies between the king and his subjects, in order to stifle the conspiracy.

42. A motion being made for leave to bring in a bill to attain him of high treason, a warm debate ensued; and the question being put, was carried in the affirmative by a great majority: he was furnished with a copy of a bill, and allowed the use of pen, ink, paper, and counsel. When he presented a petition, praying that his counsel might be heard against passing the bill, they made an order that his counsel should be allowed to make his defence at the bar of the house; so that he was surprised into an irregular trial, instead of being indulged with an opportunity of offering objections to their passing the bill of attainder: he was accordingly brought to the bar of the house; and the bill being read in his hearing, the speaker called on the king's counsel to open the evidence: the prisoner's counsel objected to their proceeding to trial, alleging that their client had not received the least notice of their purpose, and therefore could not be prepared for his defence; but that they came to offer their reasons against the bill: the house, after a long debate, resolved that he should be allowed farther time to produce witnesses in his defence; that the counsel for the king should likewise be allowed to produce evidence to prove the treasons of which he stood indicted; and an order was made for his being brought to the bar again in three days. In pursuance of this order, he appeared, when the indictment which had been found against him by the grand jury was produced; and Porter was examined as an evidence: then the record of Clancey's conviction was read; and one Roe testified, that Dighton, the prisoner's solicitor, had offered him an annuity of £100, to discredit the testimony of Goodman. The king's counsel moved, that Goodman's examination, as taken by Mr. Vernon, clerk of the council, might be read: Sir J. Powis and Sir Bartholomew Shower, the prisoner's counsel, warmly opposed this proposal: they affirmed, that a deposition, taken when the party affected by it was not present to cross-examine the deposer, could not be admitted in a case of five shillings value: that though the house was not bound by the rules of inferior courts, it was nevertheless bound by the eternal and unalterable rules of justice: that no evidence, according to the rules of law, could be admitted in such a case, but that of living witnesses; and that the examination of a person who is absent was never read to supply his testimony. The dispute between the lawyers on this subject gave rise to a very violent debate among the members of the house: Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Harley, Mr. Harcourt, Mr. Manly, Sir Christopher Musgrave, and all the leaders of the tory party argued against the hardship and injustice of admitting this information as an evidence: they demonstrated, that it would be a step contrary to the practice of all courts of judicature, repugnant to the common notions of justice and humanity, diametrically opposite to the last act for regulating trials in cases of high treason, and of dangerous consequences to the lives and liberties of the people: on the other hand, lord Cutts, Sir Thomas Lyttleton, Mr. Montagu, Mr. Smith, of the treasury, and Trevor, the attorney-general, affirmed that the house was not bound by any form of law whatsoever; that this was an extraordinary case, in which the safety of the government was deeply concerned; that though the common law might require two evidences in cases of treason, the house had a power of deviating from those rules in extraordinary cases; that there was no reason to doubt of Sir John Fenwick's being concerned in the conspiracy; that he or his friends had tampered with Porter; and that there were strong presumptions to believe the same practices had induced Goodman to abscond: in a word, the tories, either from party or patriotism, strenuously asserted the cause of liberty and humanity by those very arguments which had been used against them in the former reigns; while the whigs, with equal violence and more success, espoused the dictates of arbitrary power and oppression, in the face of their former principles, with which they were now upbraided : at length, the question was put, whether or not the information of Goodman should be read ; and was carried in the affirmative by a majority of seventy-three voices : then two of the grand jury who had found the indictment, recited the evidence which had been given to them by Porter and Goodman ; lastly, the king's counsel insisted on producing the record of Cooke's conviction, as he had been tried for the same conspiracy. The prisoner's counsel objected, that if such evidence was admitted, the trial of one person in the same company would be the trial of all ; and it could not be expected that they who came to defend Sir John Fenwick only should be prepared to answer the charge against Cooke : this article produced another vehement debate among the members, and the whigs obtained a second victory : the record was read, and the king's counsel proceeded to call some of the jury who served on Cooke's trial, to affirm that he had been convicted on Goodman's evidence. Sir Bartholomew Shower said, he would submit it to the consideration of the house, whether it was just that the evidence against one person should conclude against another standing at a different bar, in defence of his life : the parties were again ordered to withdraw ; and from this point arose a third debate, which ended, as the two former, to the disadvantage of the prisoner : the jury being examined, Mr. sergeant Gould moved, that Mr. Vernon might be desired to produce the intercepted letter from Sir John Fenwick to his lady : the prisoner's counsel warmly opposed this motion, insisting on their proving it to be his hand-writing before it could be used against him ; and no farther stress was laid on this evidence. When they were called on to enter on his defence, they pleaded incapacity to deliver matters of such importance after they had been fatigued with twelve hours attendance.

43. The house resolved to hear such evidence as the prisoner had to produce that night : his counsel declared, that they had nothing then to produce but the copy of a record ; and the second resolution was that he should be brought up again next day at noon : he accordingly appeared at the bar, and Sir J. Powis proceeded on his defence. He observed, that the bill under consideration affected the lives of the subjects, and such precedents were dangerous ; that Sir John Fenwick was forthcoming, in order to be tried by the ordinary methods of justice ; that he was actually under process, had pleaded, and was ready to stand trial ; that if there was sufficient clear evidence against him, as the king's sergeant had declared, there was no reason for his being deprived of the benefit of such a trial as was the birthright of every British subject ; and if there was a deficiency of legal evidence, he thought this was a very odd reason for the bill : he took notice that even the regicides had the benefit of such a trial ; that the last act for regulating trials in cases of treason proved the great tenderness of the laws which affected the life of the subject ; and he expressed his surprise, that the very parliament which had passed that law, should enact another for putting a person to death without any trial at all : he admitted that there had been many bills of attainder, but they were generally levelled at outlaws and fugitives ; and some of them had been reversed in the sequel, as arbitrary and unjust ; he urged, that this bill of attainder did not allege or say that Sir John Fenwick was guilty of the treason for which he had been indicted ; a circumstance which prevented him from producing witnesses to that and several matters on which the king's counsel had expatiated : he said they had introduced evidence to prove circumstances not alleged in the bill, and defective evidence of those that were ; that Porter was not examined on oath ; that nothing could be more severe than to pass sentence of death on a man, corrupt his blood, and confiscate his estate, on parole evidence ; especially of such a wretch, who, by his own confession, had been engaged in a crime of the blackest nature, not a convert to the dictates of conscience, but a coward, shrinking from the danger by which he had been environed, and even now drudging for a pardon. He invalidated the evidence of Goodman's examination : he observed, that the indictment mentioned a conspiracy to call in a foreign power ; but, as this conspiracy had not been put in practice, such an agreement was not a sufficient overt act of treason, according to the opinion of Hawles, the solicitor-general, concerned in this very prosecution. So saying, he produced a book of remarks, which that lawyer had published on the cases of lord Russell, colonel Sidney, and others, who had suffered death in the reign of Charles II. 'This author,' said he, 'takes notice that a conspiracy or agreement to levy war is not treason without actually levying war ;' a sentiment, in which he concurred with lord Coke, and lord chief-justice

Hales : he concluded with saying, ' We know at present on what ground we stand ; by the statute of Edward III. we know what treason is ; by the two statutes of Edward VI. and the late act, we know what is proof ; by the Magna Charta we know we are to be tried per legem terræ et per judicium parium, by the law of the land and the judgment of our peers ; but if bills of attainder come into fashion, we shall neither know what is treason, what is evidence, nor how nor where we are to be tried.' He was seconded by Sir Bartholomew Shower, who spoke with equal energy and elocution ; and their arguments were answered by the king's counsel. The argument in favor of the bill imported, that the parliament would not interpose except in extraordinary cases ; that here the evidence necessary in inferior courts being defective, the parliament, which was not tied down by legal evidence, had a right to exert their extraordinary power in punishing an offender, who would otherwise escape with impunity ; that as the law stood, he was but a sorry politician that could not ruin the government, and yet elude the statute of treason ; that if a plot, after being discovered, should not be thoroughly prosecuted, it would strengthen and grow on the administration, and probably at length subvert the government ; that it was notorious that parties were forming for king James ; persons were plotting in every part of the kingdom, and an open invasion was threatened ; therefore this was a proper time for the parliament to exert their extraordinary power ; that the English differed from all other nations, in bringing the witnesses and the prisoner face to face, and requiring two witnesses in cases of treason ; nor did the English law itself require the same proof in some cases as in others, for one witness was sufficient in felony, as well as for the treason of coining ; that Fenwick was notoriously guilty, and deserved to feel the resentment of the nation ; that he would have been brought to exemplary punishment in the ordinary course of justice, had he not eluded it by corrupting evidence, and withdrawing a witness. If this reasoning be just, the house of commons has a right to act in diametrical opposition to the laws in being ; and is vested with a despotic power over the lives and fortunes of their constituents, for whose protection they are constituted : let us therefore reflect on the possibility of a parliament debauched by the arts of corruption into servile compliance with the designs of an arbitrary prince, and tremble for the consequence. The debate being finished, the prisoner was, at the desire of admiral Russell, questioned with regard to the imputations he had fixed on that gentleman and others from hearsay; but he desired to be excused, on account of the risk he ran while under a double prosecution, if any thing which should escape him might be turned to his prejudice.

44. After he was removed from the bar, Mr. Vernon, at the desire of the house, recapitulated the arts and practices of Sir John Fenwick and his friends to procrastinate the trial: the bill was read a second time; and the speaker asking if the question should be put for its being committed, the house was immediately kindled into a new flame of contention. Hawles, the solicitor-general, affirmed, that the house in the present case should act both as judge and jury; Mr. Harcourt said, he knew no trial for treason but what was confirmed by Magna Charta, by a jury, the birthright and darling privilege of an Englishman, or per legem terræ, which includes impeachments in parliaments; that it was a strange trial where the person accused had a chance to be hanged, but none to be saved; that he never heard of a jurymen who was not on his oath, nor of a judge who had not power to examine witnesses on oath, and who was not empowered to save the innocent as well as to condemn the guilty: Sir Thomas Lyttleton was of opinion, that the parliament ought not to stand on little niceties and forms of other courts, when the government was at stake: Mr. Howe asserted, that to do a thing of this nature, because the parliament had power to do it, was a strange way of reasoning; that what was justice and equity at Westminster-hall was justice and equity every where: that one bad precedent in parliament was of worse consequence than a hundred in Westminster-hall, because personal or private injuries did not foreclose the claims of original right, whereas the parliament could ruin the nation beyond redemption, because it could establish tyranny by law: Sir Richard Temple, in arguing against the bill, observed that the power of parliament is to make any law, but the jurisdiction of parliament is to govern itself by the law; to make a law, therefore, against all the laws of England, was the ultimum remedium et pessimum, never to be used but in case of absolute necessity: he affirmed, that by this precedent the house overthrew all the laws of England; first in condemning a man on one witness; secondly, in passing an act without any trial: the commons never did nor can assume a jurisdiction of trying any person ; they may, for their own information, hear what can be offered ; but it is not a trial where witnesses are not on oath : all bills of attainder have passed against persons that were dead or fled, or without the compass of the law ; some have been brought in after trials in Westminster-hall ; but none of those have been called trials, and they were generally reversed : he denied that the parliament had power to declare any thing treason which was not treason before : when inferior courts were dubious, the case might be brought before the parliament, to judge whether it was treason or felony ; but then they must judge by the laws in being ; and this judgment was not in the parliament by bill, but only in the house of lords : lord Digby, Mr. Harley, and colonel Granville spoke to the same purpose ; but their arguments and remonstrances had no effect on the majority, by whom the prisoner was devoted to destruction : the bill was committed, passed, and sent up to the house of lords, where it produced the longest and warmest debates which had been known since the restoration : bishop Burnet signalised his zeal for the government by a long speech in favor of the bill, contradicting some of the fundamental maxims which he had formerly avowed in behalf of the liberties of the people : at length it was carried by a majority of seven voices ; and one-and-forty lords, including eight prelates, entered a protest, couched in the strongest terms, against the decision.

45. When the bill received the royal assent, another act of the like nature passed against Barclay, Holmes, and nine other conspirators who had fled from justice, in case they should not surrender themselves on or before the twenty-fifth of March next ensuing. Sir John Fenwick solicited the mediation of the lords in his behalf, while his friends implored the royal mercy : the peers gave him to understand that the success of his suit would depend on the fulness of his discoveries : he would have previously stipulated for a pardon, and they insisted on his depending on their favor : he hesitated some time between the fears of infamy and the terrors of death, which last he at length chose to undergo rather than incur the disgraceful character of an informer : he was complimented with the axe, in consideration of his rank and alliance with the house of Howard, and suffered on Tower-hill with great composure. In the paper which he delivered to the sheriff, he took God to witness that he knew not of the intended invasion, until it was the common subject of discourse ; nor was he engaged in any shape for the service of king James : he thanked those noble and worthy persons who had opposed his attainder in parliament ; protested before God, that the information he gave to the ministry he had received in letters and messages from France ; and observed that he might have expected mercy from the prince of Orange, as he had been instrumental in saving his life, by preventing the execution of a design which had been formed against it ;—a circumstance, which in all probability induced the late conspirators to conceal their purpose of assassination from his knowledge : he professed his loyalty to king James, and prayed Heaven for his speedy restoration.

46. While Fenwick's affair was in agitation, the earl of Monmouth had set on foot some practices against the duke of Shrewsbury [1697.] : one Matthew Smith, nephew to Sir William Perkins, had been entertained as a spy by this nobleman, who finding his intelligence of very little use or importance, dismissed him as a troublesome dependent : then he had recourse to the earl of Monmouth, into whom he infused unfavorable sentiments of the duke ; insinuating, that he had made great discoveries, which from sinister motives were suppressed : Monmouth communicated those impressions to the earl of Portland, who enlisted Smith as one of his intelligencers : copies of the letters he had sent to the duke of Shrewsbury were delivered to secretary Trumball, sealed up for the perusal of his majesty at his return from Flanders. When Fenwick mentioned the duke of Shrewsbury in his discoveries, the earl of Monmouth resolved to seize the opportunity of ruining that nobleman : he, by the channel of the duchess of Norfolk, exhorted lady Fenwick to prevail on her husband to persist in his accusation, and even dictated a paper of directions : Fenwick rejected the proposal with disdain, as a scandalous contrivance ; and Monmouth was so incensed at his refusal, that when the bill of attainder appeared in the house of lords, he spoke in favor of it with peculiar vehemence. Lady Fenwick, provoked at this cruel outrage, prevailed on her nephew, the earl of Carlisle, to move the house that Sir John might be examined touching any advices that had been sent to him with relation to his discoveries : Fenwick being interrogated accordingly, gave an account of all the particulars of Monmouth's scheme, which was calculated to ruin the duke of Shrewsbury, by bringing Smith's letters on the carpet : the duchess of Norfolk and a confidant were examined, and confirmed the detection : the house called for Smith's letters, which were produced by Sir William Trumball : the earl of Monmouth was committed to the Tower, and dismissed from all his employments : he was released, however, at the end of the session ; and the court made up all his losses in private, lest he should be tempted to join the opposition.

47. The whigs, before they were glutted with the sacrifice of Fenwick, had determined to let loose their vengeance on Sir George Rooke, who was a leader in the opposite interest. Sir Cloudesley Shovel had been sent with a squadron to look into Brest, where, according to the intelligence which the government had received, the French were employed in preparing for a descent on England ; but this information was false : they were busy in equipping an armament for the West-Indies, under the command of M. Pointis, who actually sailed to the coast of New Spain, and took the city of Carthagena. Rooke had been ordered to intercept the Toulon squadron in its way to Brest ; but his endeavors miscarried : the commons, in a committee of the whole house, resolved to inquire why this fleet was not intercepted ; Rooke underwent a long examination, and was obliged to produce his journal, orders, and letters : Shovel and Mitchell were likewise examined ; but nothing appearing to the prejudice of the admiral, the house thought proper to desist from their prosecution : after they had determined on the fate of Fenwick, they proceeded to enact several laws for regulating the domestic economy of the nation ; among others, they passed an act for the more effectual relief of creditors in cases of escape, and for preventing abuses in prisons and pretended privileged places :<sup>2</sup> ever since the reformation, certain places in and about the city of London, which had been sanctuaries during the prevalence of the popish religion, afforded asylum to debtors, and were become receptacles of desperate persons, who presumed to set the law at defiance : one of these places, called White-Friars, was filled with a crew of ruffians, who every day committed acts of violence and outrage ; but this law was so vigorously put in execution, that they were obliged to abandon the district, which was soon filled with more creditable inhabitants. On the sixteenth of April, the king closed the session with a short speech, thanking the parliament for the great supplies they had so cheerfully granted, and expressing his satisfaction at the measures they had taken for retrieving the public credit : before he quitted the kingdom, he ventured to produce on the scene the earl of Sunderland, who had hitherto prompted his councils behind the curtain : that politician was now sworn of the privy-council, and gratified with the office of lord chamberlain, which had been resigned by the earl of Dorset, a nobleman of elegant talents and invincible indolence ; severe and poignant in his writings and remarks on mankind in general, but humane, good-natured, and generous to excess in his commerce with individuals.

48. William, having made some promotions,<sup>3</sup> and appointed a regency, embarked on the twenty-sixth of April for Holland, that he might be at hand to manage the negotiation for a general peace : by this time the preliminaries were settled between Callieres the French minister, and Mr. Dykvelt, in behalf of the States-General, who resolved, in consequence of the concessions made by France, that, in concert with their allies, the mediation of Sweden might be accepted : the emperor and the court of Spain, however, were not satisfied with those concessions ; yet his imperial majesty declared he would embrace the proffered mediation, provided the treaty of Westphalia should be re-established, and provided the king of Sweden would engage to join his troops with those of the allies in case France should break through this stipulation. This proposal being delivered, the ministers of England and Holland at Vienna presented a joint memorial, pressing his imperial majesty to accept the mediation without reserve, and name a place at which the congress might be opened : the emperor complied with reluctance : on the fourteenth of February, all the ministers of the allies, except the ambassador of Spain, agreed to the proposal ; and next day signified their assent in form to M. Lillienroot, the Swedish plenipotentiary. Spain demanded, as a preliminary, that France should agree to restore all the places mentioned in a long list, which the minister of that crown presented to the assembly : the em-

<sup>3</sup> Somers was created a baron, and appointed lord chancellor of England ; admiral Russell was dignified with the title of earl of Orford. In February, the earl of Aylesbury, who had been committed on account of the conspiracy, was released on bail ; but this privilege was denied to lord Montgomery, who had been imprisoned in Newgate on the same account.

peror proposed that the congress should be held at Aix-la-Chapelle, or Frankfort, or some other town in Germany: the other allies were more disposed to negotiate in Holland: at length, the French king suggested, that no place would be more proper than a palace belonging to king William, called Newbourg-house, situated between the Hague and Delft, close by the village of Ryswick; and to this proposition the ministers agreed: those of England were the earl of Pembroke, a virtuous, learned, and popular nobleman, the lord Villiers, and Sir Joseph Williamson: France sent Harley and Crecy to the assistance of Callieres. Louis was not only tired of the war, on account of the misery in which it had involved his kingdom; but in desiring a peace he was actuated by another motive: the king of Spain had been for some time in a very ill state of health, and the French monarch had an eye to the succession: this aim could not be accomplished while the confederacy subsisted; therefore he eagerly sought a peace, that he might at once turn his whole power against Spain, as soon as Charles should expire: the emperor harbored the same design on the Spanish crown, and for that reason interested himself in the continuance of the grand alliance: besides, he foresaw he should in a little time be able to act against France with an augmented force: the czar of Muscovy had engaged to find employment for the Turks and Tartars: he intended to raise the elector of Saxony to the throne of Poland; and he had made some progress in a negociation with the circles of the Rhine, for a considerable body of auxiliary troops: the Dutch had no other view but that of securing a barrier in the Netherlands: king William insisted on the French king's acknowledging his title; and the English nation wished for nothing so much as the end of a ruinous war. On the tenth of February, Callieres, in the name of his master, agreed to the following preliminaries: that the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be the basis of this negociation; that Strasburg should be restored to the empire, and Luxemburg to the Spaniards, together with Mons, Charleroy, and all places taken by the French in Catalonia since the treaty of Nimeguen; that Dinant should be ceded to the bishop of Liege, and all reunion since the treaty of Nimeguen be made void; that the French king should make restitution of Lorraine, and, on conclusion of the peace, acknowledge the prince of Orange as king of Great Britain without condition or reserve. The conferences were interrupted by the death of Charles XI. king of Sweden, who was succeeded by his son Charles, then a minor; but the queen and five senators, whom the late king had by will appointed administrators of the government, resolved to pursue the mediation, and sent a new commission to Lillienroot for that purpose. The ceremonials being regulated with the consent of all parties, the plenipotentiaries of the emperor delivered their master's demands to the mediator on the twenty-second of May, and several German ministers gave in the pretensions of the respective princes whom they represented.

49. Meanwhile, the French king, in the hope of procuring more favorable terms, resolved to make his last effort against the Spaniards in Catalonia and in the Netherlands, and to elevate the prince of Conti to the throne of Poland; an event which would have greatly improved the interest of France in Europe: Louis had got the start of the confederates in Flanders, and sent thither a very numerous army, commanded by Catinat, Villeroy, and Boufflers. The campaign was opened with the siege of Ath, which was no sooner invested, than king William, having recovered of an indisposition, took the field, and had an interview with the duke of Bavaria, who commanded a separate body: he did not think proper to interrupt the enemy in their operations before Ath, which surrendered in a few days after the trenches were opened; but contented himself with taking possession of an advantageous camp, where he covered Brussels, which Villeroy and Boufflers had determined to besiege. In Catalonia, the duke of Vendome invested Barcelona, in which there was a garrison of 10,000 regular soldiers, besides 5000 burghers, who had voluntarily taken arms on this occasion: the governor of the place was the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who had served in Ireland, and been vested with the command of the imperial troops which were sent into Spain. The French general, being reinforced from Provence and Languedoc, carried on his approaches with surprising impetuosity, and was repulsed in several attacks by the valor of the defendants: at length, the enemy surprised and routed the viceroy of Catalonia; and, flushed with this victory, stormed the outworks, which had been long battered with their cannon: the dispute was very bloody and obstinate; but the French by dint of numbers made themselves masters of the covered way and two bastions: there they erected batteries of cannon and mortars, and fired furiously on the town, which, however, the prince of Hesse resolved to defend to the last extremity: the court of Madrid, however, unwilling to see the place intirely ruined, as in all probability it would be restored at the peace, despatched an order to the prince to capitulate; and he obtained very honorable terms, after having made a glorious defence for nine weeks, in consideration of which he was appointed viceroy of the province. France was no sooner in possession of this important place, than the Spaniards became as eager for peace as they had been before averse to a negotiation.

50. Their impatience was not a little inflamed by the success of Pointis in America, where he took Carthagena, in which he found a booty, amounting to 8,000,000 of crowns: having ruined the fortifications of the place, and received advice that an English squadron under admiral Nevil had arrived in the West-Indies, with a design to attack him in his return, he bore away for the straits of Bahama: on the twenty-second of May he fell in with the English fleet, and one of his fly-boats was taken; but such was his dexterity or good fortune, that he escaped, after having been pursued five days, during which the English and Dutch rear-admirals sprang their fore-topmasts, and received other damage, so that they could not proceed: then Nevil steered to Carthagena, which he found quite abandoned by the inhabitants, who, after the departure of Pointis, had been rifled a second time by the buccaneers, on pretence that they had been defrauded of their share of the plunder: this was really the case; they had in a great measure contributed to the success of Pointis, and were very ill rewarded. In a few days the English admiral discovered eight sail of their ships, two of which were forced on shore and destroyed, two taken, and the rest escaped: then he directed his course to Jamaica, and, by the advice of the governor, Sir William Beeston detached rear-admiral Meeze with some ships and forces to attack Petit-Guavas, which he accordingly surprised, burned, and reduced to ashes. After this small expedition, Nevil proceeded to the Havanna on purpose to take the galleons under his convoy for Europe, according to the instructions he had received from the king: but the governor of the place, and the general of the Plate-fleet, suspecting such an offer, would neither suffer him to enter the harbor, nor put the galleons under his protection: he now sailed through the gulf of Florida to Virginia, where he died of chagrin, and the command of the fleet devolved on captain Dilkes, who arrived in England on the twenty-fourth of October, with a shattered squadron, half-manned, to the unspeakable mortification of the people, who flattered themselves with the hopes of wealth and glory from this expedition. Pointis, steering to the banks of Newfoundland, entered the bay of Conception, at a time when a stout English squadron, commanded by commodore Norris, lay at anchor in the bay of St. John : this officer being informed of the arrival of a French fleet, at first concluded that it was the squadron of M. Nesmond come to attack him, and exerted his utmost endeavors to put the place in a posture of defence ; but afterwards, understanding that it was Pointis returning with the spoil of Carthagena, he called a council of war, and proposed to go immediately in quest of the enemy : he was, however, over-ruled by a majority, who gave it as their opinion that they should remain where they were, without running unnecessary hazard : by virtue of this scandalous determination, Pointis was permitted to proceed on his voyage to Europe ; but he had not yet escaped every danger : on the fourteenth of August he fell in with a squadron under the command of captain Harlow, by whom he was boldly engaged till night parted the combatants : he was pursued next day ; but his ships sailing better than those of Harlow, he accomplished his escape, and on the morrow entered the harbor of Brest. That his ships, which were foul, should out-sail the English squadron, which had just put to sea, was a mystery which the people of England could not explain : they complained of having been betrayed through the whole course of the West-Indian expedition. The king owned he did not understand marine affairs, the intire conduct of which he abandoned to Russell, who became proud, arbitrary, and unpopular, and was supposed to be betrayed by his dependents : certain it is, the service was greatly obstructed by faction among the officers, which with respect to the nation had all the effects of treachery and misconduct.

51. The success of the French in Catalonia, Flanders, and the West-Indies, was balanced by their disappointment in Poland : Louis, encouraged by the remonstrances of the abbé de Polignac, who managed the affairs of France in that kingdom, resolved to support the prince of Conti as a candidate for the crown, and remitted great sums of money, which were distributed among the Polish nobility : the emperor had at first declared for the son of the late king ; but, finding the French party too strong for his competitor, he entered into a negociation with the elector of Saxony, who agreed to change his religion, to distribute 8,000,000 florins among the Poles, to confirm their privileges, and advance with his troops to the frontiers of that kingdom : having performed these articles, he declared himself a candidate, and was publicly espoused by the imperialists : the duke of Lorrain, the prince of Baden, and Don Livio Odeschalchi, nephew to pope Innocent, were likewise competitors ; but, finding their interest insufficient, they united their influence with that of the elector, who was proclaimed king of Poland : he forthwith took the oath required, procured an attestation from the imperial court of his having changed his religion, and marched with his army to Cracow, where he was crowned with the usual solemnity. Louis persisted in maintaining the pretensions of the prince of Conti, and equipped a fleet at Dunkirk for his convoy to Dantzic in his way to Poland ; but the magistrates of that city, who had declared for the new king, would not suffer his men to land, though they offered to admit himself with a small retinue : he therefore went on shore at Marienburg, where he was met by some chiefs of his own party ; but the new king Augustus acted with such vigilance, that he found it impracticable to form an army ; besides, he suspected the fidelity of his own Polish partisans : he, therefore, refused to part with the treasure he had brought, and in the beginning of winter returned to Dunkirk.

52. The establishment of Augustus on the throne of Poland was in some measure owing to the conduct of Peter, the czar of Muscovy, who having formed great designs against the Ottoman Porte, was very unwilling to see the crown of Poland possessed by a partisan of France, which was in alliance with the grand signor : he, therefore, interested himself warmly in the dispute, and ordered his general to assemble an army on the frontiers of Lithuania, which, by overawing the Poles that were in the interest of the prince of Conti, considerably influenced the election. This extraordinary legislator, who was a strange compound of heroism and barbarity, conscious of the defects in his education and of the gross ignorance that overspread his dominions, resolved to extend his ideas, and improve his judgment by travelling ; and that he might be the less restricted by forms, or interrupted by officious curiosity, he determined to travel in disguise : he was extremely ambitious of becoming a maritime power, and in particular of maintaining a fleet in the Black Sea ; and his immediate aim was to learn the principles of ship-building : he appointed an embassy for Holland to regulate some points of commerce with the States-General : having entrusted the care of his dominions to persons in whom he could confide, he now disguised himself, and travelled as one of their retinue : he first disclosed himself to the elector of Brandenburg in Prussia, and afterwards to king William, with whom he conferred in private at Utrecht : he engaged himself as a common laborer with a ship-carpenter in Holland, whom he served for some months with wonderful patience and assiduity : he afterwards visited England, where he amused himself chiefly with the same kind of occupation : from thence he set out for Vienna ; where receiving advices from his dominions, that his sister was concerned in managing intrigues against his government, he returned suddenly to Moscow, and found the machinations of the conspirators were already baffled by the vigilance and fidelity of the foreigners to whom he had left the care of the administration : his savage nature, however, broke out on this occasion ; he ordered some hundreds to be hanged all round his capital ; and a good number were beheaded, he himself with his own hand performing the office of executioner.

53. The negotiations at Ryswick proceeded very slowly for some time : the imperial minister demanded that France should make restitution of all the places and dominions she had wrested from the empire since the peace of Munster, whether by force of arms or pretence of right : the Spaniards claimed all they could demand by virtue of the peace of Nimeguen and the treaty of the Pyrenees : the French affirmed, that if the preliminaries offered by Callieres were accepted, these propositions could not be taken into consideration : the imperialists persisted in demanding a circumstantial answer, article by article : the Spaniards insisted on the same manner of proceeding, and called on the mediator and Dutch ministers to support their pretensions : the plenipotentiaries of France declared, they would not admit any demand or proposition, contrary to the preliminary articles ; but were willing to deliver in a project of peace, in order to shorten the negotiations ; and the Spanish ambassadors consented to this expedient. During these transactions, the earl of Portland held a conference with marshal Boufflers, near Halle, in sight of the two opposite armies, which was continued in five successive meetings : on the second of August they retired together to a house in the suburbs of Halle, and mutually signed a paper, in which the principal articles of the peace between France and England were adjusted : next day king William quitted the camp, and retired to his house at Loo, confident of having taken such measures for a pacification as could not be disappointed. The subject of this field negociation is said to have turned on the interest of king James, which the French monarch promised to abandon : others, however, suppose that the first foundation of the partition treaty was laid in this conference : but, in all probability, William's sole aim was to put an end to an expensive and unsuccessful war, which had rendered him very unpopular in his own dominions, and to obtain from the court of France an acknowledgement of his title, which had, since the queen's death, become the subject of dispute : he perceived the emperor's backwardness towards a pacification, and foresaw numberless difficulties in discussing such a complication of interests by the common method of treating ; he therefore chose such a step as he thought would alarm the jealousy of the allies, and quicken the negociation at Ryswick. Before the congress was opened, king James had published two manifestos, addressed to the catholic and protestant princes of the confederacy, representing his wrongs, and craving redress ; but his remonstrances being altogether disregarded, he afterwards issued a third declaration, solemnly protesting against all that might or should be negociated, regulated, or stipulated with the usurper of his realms, as being void of all rightful and lawful authority : on the twentieth of July the French ambassadors produced their project of a general peace, declaring at the same time that should it not be accepted before the last day of August, France would not hold herself bound for the conditions she now offered ; but Caunitz, the emperor's plenipotentiary, protested he would pay no regard to this limitation : on the thirtieth of August, however, he delivered to the mediators an ultimatum, importing that he adhered to the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen, and accepted of Strasburg with its appurtenances ; that he insisted on the restitution of Lorrain to the prince of that name ; and demanded that the church and chapter of Liege should be re-established in the possession of their incontestable rights : next day the French plenipotentiaries declared, that the month of August being now expired, all their offers were vacated; that therefore the king of France would reserve Strasburg, and unite it, with its dependencies, to his crown for ever: that in other respects he would adhere to the project, and restore Barcelona to the crown of Spain; but that these terms must be accepted in twenty days, otherwise he should think himself at liberty to recede. The ministers of the electors and princes of the empire joined in a written remonstrance to the Spanish plenipotentiaries, representing the inconveniences and dangers that would accrue to the Germanic body from France's being in possession of Luxemburg, and exhorting them in the strongest terms to reject all offers of an equivalent for that province: they likewise presented another to the States-General, requiring them to continue the war, according to their engagements, until France should have complied with the preliminaries: no regard however was paid to either of these addresses: then the imperial ambassadors demanded the good offices of the mediator on certain articles; but all that he could obtain of France was, that the term for adjusting the peace between her and the emperor should be prolonged till the first of November, and in the mean time an armistice be punctually observed: yet even these concessions were made, on condition that the treaty with England, Spain, and Holland should be signed on that day, even though the emperor and empire should not concur.

54. Accordingly, on the twentieth of September, the articles were subscribed by the Dutch, English, Spanish, and French ambassadors, while the imperial ministers protested against the transaction, observing this was the second time that a separate peace had been concluded with France; and that the states of the empire, who had been imposed on through their own credulity, would not for the future be so easily persuaded to engage in confederacies. In certain preparatory articles settled between England and France, king William promised to pay a yearly pension to queen Mary D'Este, of £50,000, or such sum as should be established for that purpose by act of parliament. The treaty itself consisted of seventeen articles: the French king engaged, that he would not disturb or disquiet the king of Great Britain in the possession of his realms or government; nor assist his enemies, nor favor conspiracies against his person: this obligation was reciprocal: a free commerce was restored: commissaries were appointed to meet at London, and settle the pretensions of each crown to Hudson's-bay, taken by the French during the late peace, and retaken by the English in the course of the war; and to regulate the limits of the places to be restored, as well as the exchanges to be made: it was likewise stipulated, that, in case of a rupture, six months should be allowed to the subjects of each power for removing their effects: that the separate articles of the treaty of Nimeguen, relating to the principality of Orange, should be intirely executed; and that the ratifications should be exchanged in three weeks from the day of signing. The treaty between France and Holland imported a general armistice, a perpetual amity, a mutual restitution, a reciprocal renunciation of all pretensions on each other, a confirmation of the peace with Savoy, a re-establishment of the treaty concluded between France and Brandenburg in the year 1679, a comprehension of Sweden, and all those powers that should be named before the ratification, or in six months after the conclusion of the treaty: besides, the Dutch ministers concluded a treaty of commerce with France, which was immediately put in execution. Spain had great reason to be satisfied with the pacification, by which she recovered Gironne, Roses, Barcelona, Luxemburg, Charleroy, Mons, Courtray, and all the towns, fortresses, and territories taken by the French in the province of Luxemburg, Namur, Brabant, Flanders, and Hainault, except eighty-two towns and villages claimed by the French: this dispute was left to the decision of the commissaries; or, in case they should not agree, to the determination of the States-General. A remonstrance in favor of the French protestant refugees in England, Holland, and Germany was delivered by the earl of Pembroke to the mediators, in the name of the protestant allies, on the day that preceded the conclusion of the treaty; but the French plenipotentiaries declared, in the name of their master, that as he did not pretend to prescribe rules to king William about the English subjects, he expected the same liberty with respect to his own: no other effort was made in behalf of those conscientious exiles; the treaties were ratified, and the peace proclaimed at Paris and London.

55. The emperor still held out, and perhaps was encouraged to persevere in his obstinacy by the success of his arms in Hungary, where his general, prince Eugene of Savoy, obtained a complete victory at Zenta over the forces of the grand signor, who commanded his army in person.

In this battle, which was fought on the eleventh of September, the grand visir, the aga of the janissaries, seven-and-twenty bashaws, and about 30,000 men, were killed or drowned in the river Theysse: 6000 were wounded or taken, together with all their artillery, tents, baggage, provision, and ammunition, the grand signor himself escaping with difficulty; a victory the more glorious and acceptable, as the Turks had a great superiority in point of number, and as the imperialists did not lose 1000 men during the whole action. The emperor, perceiving that the event of this battle had no effect in retarding the treaty, thought proper to make use of the armistice, and continue the negotiation after the fore-mentioned treaties had been signed: this was likewise the case with the princes of the empire, though those of the protestant persuasion complained that their interest was neglected: in one of the articles of the treaty it was stipulated, that in the places to be restored by France, the Roman catholic religion should continue as it had been re-established: the ambassadors of the protestant princes joined in a remonstrance, demanding that the Lutheran religion should be restored in those places where it had formerly prevailed; but this demand was rejected, as being equally disagreeable to France and the emperor: then they refused to sign the treaty, which was now concluded between France, the emperor, and the catholic princes of the empire. By this pacification, Triers, the palatinate, and Lorrain were restored to their respective owners: the countries of Spanheim and Veldentz, together with the duchy of Deux Ponts, were ceded to the king of Sweden: Francis Louis Palatine was confirmed in the electorate of Cologne; and cardinal Furstemberg restored to all his rights and benefices: the claims of the duchess of Orleans on the palatinate were referred to the arbitration of France and the emperor; and in the mean time the elector palatine agreed to supply her highness with an annuity of 100,000 florins: the ministers of the protestant princes published a formal declaration against the clause relating to religion, and afterwards solemnly protested against the manner in which the negotiation had been conducted. Such was the issue of a long and bloody war, which had drained England of her wealth and people, almost intirely ruined her commerce, debauched her morals by encouraging venality and corruption, and entailed on her the curse of foreign connexions, as well as a national debt, which was gradually increased to an intolerable burden. After all the blood and treasure which had been expended, William's ambition and revenge remained unsatisfied: nevertheless, he reaped the solid advantage of seeing himself firmly established on the English throne; and the confederacy, though not successful in every instance, accomplished their great aim of putting a stop to the encroachments of the French monarch: they mortified his vanity, they humbled his pride and arrogance, and compelled him to disgorge the acquisitions which, like a robber, he had made in violation of public faith, justice, and humanity: had the allies been true to one another; had they acted from genuine zeal for the common interests of mankind, and prosecuted with vigor the plan which was originally concerted; Louis would in a few campaigns have been reduced to the most abject state of disgrace, despondence, and submission; for he was destitute of true courage and magnanimity. King William, having finished this important transaction, returned to England about the middle of November, and was received in London amidst the acclamations of the people, who now again hailed him as their deliverer from a war, by the continuance of which they must have been infallibly beggared.

His death ;—71. and character.

1. WHEN the king opened the session of parliament on the third of December, he told them the war was brought to the end they all proposed, namely, an honorable peace: he gave them to understand there was a considerable debt on account of the fleet and army; that the revenues of the crown had been anticipated: he expressed his hope, that they would provide for him during his life in such a manner as would conduce to his own honor and that of the government: he recommended the maintenance of a considerable navy; and gave it as his opinion, that for the present England could not be safe without a standing army: he promised to rectify such corruptions and abuses as might have crept into any part of the administration during the war, and effectually to discourage profaneness and immorality: finally, he assured them, that as he had rescued their religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremest danger, so he should place the glory of his reign in preserving and leaving them intire to latest posterity. To this speech the commons replied in an address by a compliment of congratulation on the peace, and an assurance that they would be ever ready to assist and support his majesty, who had confirmed them in the quiet possession of their rights and liberties; and by putting an end to the war, fully completed the work of their deliverance. Notwithstanding those appearances of good humor, the majority of the house, and indeed of the whole nation, were equally alarmed and exasperated at a project for maintaining a standing army, which was countenanced at court, and even recommended by the king in his speech to the parliament. William's genius was altogether military: he could not bear the thoughts of being a king without power: he could not without reluctance dismiss those officers who had given so many proofs of their courage and fidelity: he did not think himself safe on the naked throne, in a kingdom that swarmed with malcontents, who had so often conspired against his person and government: he dreaded the ambition and known perfidy of the French king, who still retained a powerful army: he foresaw that a reduction of the forces would lessen his importance both at home and abroad, diminish the dependence on his government, and disperse those foreigners in whose attachment he chiefly confided: he communicated his sentiments on this subject to his confidant, the earl of Sunderland, who knew by experience the aversion of the people to a standing army; nevertheless, he encouraged him with hope of success, on the supposition that the commons would see the difference between an army raised by the king's private authority, and a body of veteran troops maintained by consent of parliament for the security of the kingdom: this was a distinction to which the people paid no regard: all the jealousy of former parliaments seemed to be roused by the bare proposal; and this was inflamed by a national prejudice against the refugees, in whose favor the king had betrayed repeated marks of partial indulgence: they were submissive, tractable, and wholly dependent on his will and generosity. The Jacobites failed not to cherish the seeds of disaffection, and reproach the whigs who countenanced this measure: they branded that party with apostasy from their former principles: they observed, that the very persons, who in the late reigns endeavored to abridge the prerogative, and deprive the king of that share of power which was absolutely necessary to actuate the machine of government, were now become advocates for maintaining a standing army in time of peace; nay, and impudently avowed, that their complaisance to the court in this particular was owing to their desire of excluding from all share in the administration a faction disaffected to his majesty, which might mislead him into more pernicious measures. The majority of those who really entertained revolution-principles opposed the court from apprehensions that a standing army once established would take root, and grow into an habitual maxim of government; that should the people be disarmed, and the sword left in the hands of mercenaries, the liberties of the nation must be intirely at the mercy of him by whom these mercenaries should be commanded: they might overawe elections, dictate to parliaments, and establish a tyranny, before the people could take any measures for their own protection: they could not help thinking it was possible to form a militia, that with the concurrence of a fleet might effectually protect the kingdom from the dangers of an invasion: they firmly believed, that a militia might be regularly trained to arms, so as to acquire the dexterity of professed soldiers; and they did not doubt they would surpass those hirelings in courage, considering that they would be animated by every concurring motive of interest, sentiment, and affection: nay, they argued, that Britain, surrounded as it was by a boisterous sea, secured by floating bulwarks, abounding with stout and hardy inhabitants, did not deserve to be free, if her sons could not protect their liberties without the assistance of mercenaries, who were indeed the only slaves of the kingdom. Yet, among the genuine friends of their country, some individuals espoused the opposite maxims: they observed, that the military system of every government in Europe was now altered; that war was become a trade, and discipline a science not to be learned but by those who made it their sole profession; that, therefore, while France kept up a large standing army of veterans, ready to embark on the opposite coast, it would be absolutely necessary, for the safety of the nation, to maintain a small standing force, which should be voted in parliament from year to year. They might have suggested another expedient, which in a few years would have produced a militia of disciplined men: had the soldiers of this small standing army been enlisted for a term of years, at the expiration of which they might have claimed their discharge, volunteers would have offered themselves from all parts of the kingdom, even from the desire of learning the use and exercise of arms, the ambition of being concerned in scenes of actual service, and the chagrin of little disappointments or temporary disgusts, which yet would not have impelled them to enlist as soldiers on the common terms of perpetual slavery: in consequence of such a succession, the whole kingdom would soon have been stocked with members of a disciplined militia, equal, if not superior, to any army of professed soldiers: but this scheme would have defeated the purpose of the government, which was more afraid of domestic foes than of foreign enemies; and industriously avoided every plan of this nature, which could contribute to render the malcontents of the nation more formidable.

2. Before we proceed to the transactions of parliament in this session, it may not be amiss to sketch the outlines of the ministry, as it stood at this juncture. The king's affection for the earl of Portland had begun to abate, in proportion as his esteem for Sunderland increased, together with his consideration for Mrs. Villiers, who had been distinguished by some particular marks of his majesty's favor: these two favorites are said to have supplanted Portland, whose place in the king's bosom was now filled by Van Keppel, a gentleman of Guelderland, who had first served his majesty as a page, and afterwards acted as private secretary. The earl of Portland growing troublesome, from his jealousy of this rival, the king resolved to send him into honorable exile, in quality of an ambassador extraordinary to the court of France; and Trumball, his friend and creature, was dismissed from the office of secretary, which the king conferred on Vernon, a plodding man of business, who had acted as under-secretary to the duke of Shrewsbury: this nobleman rivalled the earl of Sunderland in his credit at the council-board, and was supported by Somers, lord chancellor of England; by Russell, now earl of Orford, first lord of the admiralty; and Montagu, chancellor of the exchequer. Somers was an upright judge, a plausible statesman, a consummate courtier; affable, mild, and insinuating: Orford appears to have been rough, turbulent, factious, and shallow: Montagu had distinguished himself early by his poetical genius; but he soon converted his attention to the cultivation of more solid talents: he rendered himself remarkable for his eloquence, discernment, and knowledge of the English constitution: to a delicate taste, he united an eager appetite for political studies: the first catered for the enjoyments of fancy; the other was subservient to his ambition: he at the same time was the distinguished encourager of the liberal arts, and the professed patron of projectors: in his private deportment he was liberal, easy, and entertaining; as a statesman, bold, dogmatical, and aspiring.

3. The terrors of a standing army had produced such a universal ferment in the nation, that the dependents of the court in the house of commons durst not openly oppose the reduction of the forces; but they shifted the battery, and employed all their address in persuading the house to agree that a very small number should be retained. When the commons voted that all the forces raised since the year 1680 should be disbanded, the courtiers desired the vote might be recommitted, on pretence that it restrained the king to the old tory regiments, on whose fidelity he could not rely: this motion, however, was over-ruled by a considerable majority: then they proposed an amendment, which was rejected; and afterwards moved, that the sum of £500,000 per annum should be granted for the maintenance of guards and garrisons: this provision would have maintained a very considerable number; but they were again disappointed, and fain to embrace a composition with the other party, by which £350,000 were allotted for the maintenance of 10,000 men; and they afterwards obtained an addition of 3000 marines. The king was extremely mortified at these resolutions of the commons; and even declared to his particular friends, that he would never have intermeddled with the affairs of the nation, had he foreseen they would make such returns of ingratitude and distrust: his displeasure was aggravated by the resentment expressed against Sunderland, who was supposed to have advised the unpopular measure of retaining a standing army: this nobleman, dreading the vengeance of the commons, resolved to avert the fury of the impending storm by resigning his office and retiring from court, contrary to the entreaties of his friends and the earnest desire of his majesty.

4. The house of commons, in order to sweeten the unpalatable cup they had presented to the king, voted the sum of £700,000 per annum for the support of the civil list, distinct from all other services: then they passed an act prohibiting the currency of silver hammered coin, including a clause for making out new exchequer bills in lieu of those which were or might be filled up with endorsements; they framed another to open the correspondence with France, under a variety of provisos; a third for continuing the imprisonment of certain persons who had been concerned in the late conspiracy; a fourth granted farther time for administering oaths with respect to talleys and orders in the exchequer and bank of England: these bills having received the royal assent, they resolved to grant a supply, which, together with the funds already settled for that purpose, should be sufficient to answer and cancel all exchequer-bills, to the amount of £2,700,000: another supply was voted for the payment and reduction of the army, including half-pay to such commission-officers as were natural-born subjects of

England: they granted £1,400,000, to make good deficiencies: they resolved, that the sum of £2,348,102 was necessary to pay off arrears, subsistence, contingences, general-officers, guards, and garrisons; of which sum £855,502 remained in the hands of the paymaster: then they took into consideration the subsidies due to foreign powers, and the sums owing to contractors for bread and forage: examining farther the debts of the nation, they found the general debt of the navy amounted to £1,392,742; that of the ordnance was equal to £204,157; the transport debt contracted for the reduction of Ireland, and other services, did not fall short of £466,493; and they owed £49,929 for quartering and clothing the army, which had been raised by one act of parliament in the year 1677, and disbanded by another in the year 1679. As this enormous load of debt could not be discharged at once, the commons passed a number of votes for raising sums of money, by which it was considerably lightened; and settled the funds for those purposes by the continuation of the land-tax, and other impositions: with respect to the civil list, it was raised by a new subsidy of tonnage and poundage, the hereditary and temporary excise, a weekly portion from the revenue of the post-office, the first-fruits and tenths of the clergy, the fines in the alienation-office and post-fines, the revenue of the wine-license, money arising by sheriffs, proffers, and compositions in the exchequer and seizures, the income of the duchy of Cornwall, the rents of all other crown-lands in England or Wales, and the duty of four and a half per cent. on specie from Barbadoes and the Leeward-islands: the bill imported, that the overplus arising from these funds should be accounted for to parliament: £600,000 of this money was allotted for the purposes of the civil list; the rest was granted for the jointure of £50,000 per annum, to be paid to queen Mary d'Este, according to the stipulation at Ryswick; and to maintain a court for the duke of Gloucester, son of the princess Anne of Denmark, now in the ninth year of his age: but the jointure was never paid; nor would the king allow above £15,000 per annum for the use of the duke of Gloucester, to whom Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, was appointed preceptor.

5. The commons, having discussed the ways and means for raising the supplies of the ensuing year, which rose almost to £5,000,000, took cognisance of some fraudulent endorsements of exchequer-bills, a species of forgery which had been practised by a confederacy, consisting of Charles Duncomb, receiver-general of the excise; Bartholomew Burton, who possessed a place in that branch of the revenue; John Knight, treasurer of the customs; and Reginald Marriot, a deputy-teller of the exchequer: this last became evidence; and the proof turning out very strong and full, the house resolved to make examples of the delinquents: Duncomb and Knight, both members of parliament, were expelled, and committed to the Tower; Burton was sent to Newgate; and bills of pains and penalties were ordered to be brought in against them.<sup>4</sup> The first, levelled at Duncomb, passed the lower house, though not without great opposition; but was rejected in the house of lords by the majority of one voice: Duncomb, who was extremely rich, is said to have paid dear for his escape: the other two bills met with the same fate: the peers discharged Duncomb from his confinement; but he was re-committed by the commons, and remained in custody till the end of the session. While the commons were employed on ways and means, some of the members in the opposition proposed that one fourth part of the money arising from improper grants of the crown should be appropriated to the service of the public; but this was a very unpalatable expedient, as it affected not only the whigs of king William's reign, but also the tories who had been gratified by Charles II. and his brother: a great number of petitions were presented against this measure, and so many difficulties raised, that both parties agreed to lay it aside: in the course of this inquiry, they discovered that one Railton held a grant in trust for Mr. Montagu, chancellor of the exchequer: a motion was immediately made, that he should withdraw; but passed in the negative by a great majority: far from prosecuting this minister, the house voted, it was their opinion, that Mr. Montagu, for his good services to the government, did deserve his majesty's favor [1698.].

6. This extraordinary vote was a sure presage of success in the execution of a scheme which Montagu had concerted against the East-India company: they had been sounded about advancing a sum of money for the public service, by way of loan in consideration of a parliamentary settlement; and they offered to raise £700,000 on that condition: but before they formed this resolution, another body of merchants, under the auspices of Montagu, offered to lend £2,000,000 at eight per cent. provided they might be gratified with an exclusive privilege of trading to the East-Indies. this proposal was very well received by the majority in the house of commons: a bill for this purpose was brought in, with additional clauses of regulation. A petition was presented by the old company, representing their rights and claims under so many royal charters; the regard due to the property of above 1000 families interested in the stock; as also to the company's property in India, amounting to £44,000 of yearly revenue: they alleged they had expended £1,000,000 in fortifications; that during the war they had lost twelve great ships, worth £1,500,000; that since the last subscription they had contributed £295,000 to the customs, with above £85,000 in taxes; that they had furnished 6000 barrels of gunpowder on a very pressing occasion; and £80,000 for the circulation of exchequer-bills at a very critical juncture, by desire of the lords of the treasury, who owned that their compliance was a very important service to the government: no regard being paid to their remonstrances, they undertook to raise the loan of £2,000,000, and immediately subscribed £200,000 as the first payment. The two proposals being compared and considered by the house, the majority declared for the bill, which was passed, and sent up to the house of lords: there the old company delivered another petition, and was heard by counsel; nevertheless, the bill made its way, though not without opposition; and a formal protestation by one-and-twenty lords, who thought it was a hardship on the present company; and doubted whether the separate trade allowed in the bill, concurrent with a joint stock, might not prove such an inconsistency as would discourage the subscription. This act, by which the old company was dissolved, in a great measure blasted the reputation of the whigs, which had for some time been on the decline with the people: they had stood up as advocates for a standing army; they now unjustly superseded the East-India company; they were accused of having robbed the public by embezzling the national treasure, and amassing wealth by usurious contracts, at the expense of their fellow-subjects, groaning under the most oppressive burdens: certain it is, they were at this period the most mercenary and corrupt undertakers that ever had been employed by any king or administration since the first establishment of the English monarchy.

7. The commons now transferred their attention to certain objects in which the people of Ireland were interested: colonel Michelborne, who had been joint governor of Londonderry with Dr. Walker during the siege of that place, petitioned the house in behalf of himself, his officers, and soldiers, to whom a considerable sum of money was due for subsistence; and the city itself implored the mediation of the commons with his majesty, that its services and sufferings might be taken into consideration: the house, having examined the allegations contained in both petitions, presented an address to the king, recommending the citizens of Londonderry to his majesty's favor; that they might no longer remain a ruinous spectacle to all, a scorn to their enemies, and a discouragement to well-affected subjects; they likewise declared, that the governor and garrison did deserve some special marks of royal favor, for a lasting monument to posterity: to this address the king replied, that he would consider them according to the desire of the commons. William Molineux, a gentleman of Dublin, having published a book to prove that the kingdom of Ireland was independent of the parliament of England, the house appointed a committee to inquire into the cause and nature of this performance: an address was voted to the king, desiring he would give directions for the discovery and punishment of the author: on the report of the committee, the commons in a body presented an address to his majesty, representing the dangerous attempts which had been lately made by some of his subjects in Ireland to shake off their subjection and dependence on England;—attempts, which appeared not only from the bold and pernicious assertions contained in a book lately published, but more fully and authentically by some votes and proceedings of the commons in Ireland. These had, during their last session, transmitted an act for the better security of his majesty's person and government, whereby an English act of parliament was pretended to be re-enacted, with alterations obligatory on the courts of justice and the great seal of England: the English commons therefore besought his majesty to give effectual orders for preventing any such encroachments for the future, and the pernicious consequences of what was past, by punishing those who had been guilty thereof; that he would take care to see the laws which direct and restrain the parliament of Ireland punctually observed, and discourage every thing which might have a tendency to lessen the dependence of Ireland on England: this remonstrance was graciously received, and the king promised to comply with their request.

8. The jealousy which the commons entertained of the government in Ireland animated them to take other measures, that ascertained the subjection of that kingdom: understanding that the Irish had established divers woollen manufactories, they, in another address, entreated his majesty to take measures for discouraging the woollen manufactures in Ireland, as they interfered with those of England; and promote the linen manufacture, which would be profitable to both nations: at the same time, receiving information that the French had seduced some English manufacturers, and set up a great work for cloth-making in Picardy, they brought in a bill for explaining and better executing former acts for preventing the exportation of wool, fullers-earth, and scouring clay; and this was immediately passed into a law. A petition being presented to the house by the lustring company, against certain merchants who had smuggled alamodes and lustrings from France, even during the war, the committee of trade was directed to inquire into the allegations; and all the secrets of this traffic were detected: on the report, the house resolved that the manufactures of alamodes and lustrings set up in England had been beneficial to the kingdom; that there had been a destructive and illegal trade carried on during the war, for importing these commodities, by which the king had been defrauded of his customs, and the English manufacturers greatly discouraged; that, by the smuggling vessels employed in this trade, intelligence had been carried into France during the war, and the enemies of the government conveyed from justice: Stephen Seignoret, Rhene, Baudoin, John Goodet, Nicholas Santini, Peter de Hearse, John Pierce, John Dumaitre, and David Barreau were impeached at the bar of the house of lords; and pleading guilty, the lords imposed fines on them, according to their respective circumstances: they were in the mean time committed to Newgate until those fines should be paid; and the commons addressed the king, that the money might be appropriated to the maintenance of Greenwich-hospital: the house having taken cognisance of this affair, and made some new regulations in the prosecution of the African trade, presented a solemn address to the king, representing the general degeneracy and corruption of the age, and beseeching his majesty to command all his judges, justices, and magistrates to put the laws in execution against profaneness and immorality: the king professed himself extremely well pleased with this remonstrance, promised to give immediate directions for a reformation, and expressed his desire that some more effectual provision might be made for suppressing impious books, containing doctrines against the Trinity; doctrines which abounded at this period, and took their origin from the licentiousness and profligacy of the times.

9. In the midst of such immorality, Dr. Thomas Bray, an active divine, formed a plan for propagating the gospel in foreign countries: missionaries, catechisms, liturgies, and other books for the instruction of ignorant people, were sent to the English colonies in America: this laudable design was supported by voluntary contribution; and the bill having been brought into the house of commons, for the better discovery of estates given to superstitious uses, Dr. Bray presented a petition, praying that some part of these estates might be set apart for the propagation of the reformed religion in Maryland, Virginia, and the Leeward-Islands. About this period, a society for the reformation of manners was formed under the king's countenance and encouragement: considerable collections were made for maintaining clergymen to read prayers at certain hours in places of public worship, and administer the sacrament every Sunday: the members of this society resolved to inform the magistrates of all vice and immorality that should fall under their cognisance; and with that part of the fines allowed by law to the informer constitute a fund of charity. The business of the session being terminated, the king, on the third of July, prorogued the parliament, after having thanked them, in a short speech, for the many testimonies of their affection he had received; and in two days after the prorogation it was dissolved.<sup>5</sup>

10. In the month of January, the earl of Portland set out

on his embassy to France, where he was received with very particular marks of distinction : he made a public entry into Paris with such magnificence, as is said to have astonished the French nation : he interceded for the protestants in that kingdom, against whom the persecution had been renewed with redoubled violence : he proposed that king James should be removed to Avignon ; in which case his master would supply him with an honorable pension ; but his remonstrances on both subjects proved ineffectual : Louis, however, in a private conference with him at Marli, is supposed to have communicated his project of the partition treaty. The earl of Portland, at his return to England, finding himself totally eclipsed in the king's favor by Keppel, now created earl of Albemarle, resigned his employments in disgust ; nor could the king's solicitations prevail on him to resume any office in the household, though he promised to serve his majesty in any other shape, and was soon employed to negotiate the treaty of partition : if this nobleman miscarried in the purposes of his last embassy at the court of Versailles, the agents of France were equally unsuccessful in their endeavors to retrieve their commerce with England, which the war had interrupted : their commissary, sent over to London with powers to regulate the trade between the two nations, met with insuperable difficulties : the parliament had burdened the French commodities with heavy duties, which were already appropriated to different uses ; and the channel of trade was in many respects intirely altered : the English merchants supplied the nation with wines from Italy, Spain, and Portugal ; with linen from Holland and Silesia ; and manufactures of paper, hats, stuffs, and silks had been set up and successfully carried on in England by the French refugees.

11. By this time a ferment had been raised in Scotland, by the opposition and discouragements their new company had sustained : they had employed agents in England, Holland, and Hamburg to receive subscriptions : the adventurers in England were intimidated by the measures which had been taken in parliament against the Scottish company : the Dutch East-India company took the alarm, and exerted all their interest to prevent their countrymen from subscribing ; and the king permitted his resident at Hamburg to present a memorial against the Scottish company to the senate of that city. The parliament of Scotland being assembled by the earl of Marchmont as king's commissioner, the company presented it with a remonstrance, containing a detail of their grievances, arising from the conduct of the English house of commons, as well as from the memorial presented by the king's minister at Hamburg, in which he actually disowned the act of parliament and letters-patent which had passed in their favor, and threatened the inhabitants of that city with his majesty's resentment in case they should join the Scots in their undertaking: they represented, that such instances of interposition had put a stop to the subscriptions in England and Hamburg, hurt the credit of the company, discouraged the adventurers, and threatened the intire ruin of a design in which all the most considerable families of the nation were deeply engaged. The parliament, having taken their case into consideration, sent an address to his majesty, representing the hardships to which the company had been exposed, explaining how far the nation in general was concerned in the design, and entreating that he would take such measures as might effectually vindicate the undoubted rights and privileges of the company: this address was seconded by a petition from the company itself, praying that his majesty would give some intimation to the senate of Hamburg, permitting the inhabitants of that city to renew the subscriptions they had withdrawn; that, as a gracious mark of his royal favor to the company, he would bestow on them two small frigates, then lying useless in the harbor of Burnt-island; and that, in consideration of the obstructions they had encountered, he would continue their privileges and immunities for such longer time as should seem reasonable to his majesty. Though the commissioner was wholly devoted to the king, who had actually resolved to ruin this company, he could not appease the resentment of the nation; and the heats in parliament became so violent, that he was obliged to adjourn it to the fifth of November: in this interval, the directors of the company, understanding from their agent at Hamburg, that the address of the parliament and their own petition had produced no effect in their favor; wrote a letter of complaint to lord Seafield, secretary of state, observing, that they had received repeated assurances of the king's having given orders to his resident at Hamburg touching their memorial; and entreating the interposition of his lordship, that justice might be done to the company: the secretary, in his answer, promised to take the first convenient opportunity of representing the affair to his majesty; but he said this could not be immediately expected, as the king was much engaged in the affairs of the English parliament: this declaration the directors considered, as it really was, a mere evasion, which helped to alienate the minds of that people from the king's person and government.

12. King William at this time revolved in his own mind a project of far greater consequence to the interest of Europe; namely, that of settling the succession to the throne of Spain, which in a little time would be vacated by the death of Charles II. whose constitution was already exhausted: he had been lately reduced to extremity; and his situation was no sooner known in France, than Louis detached a squadron towards Cadiz, with orders to intercept the Plate-fleet, in case the king of Spain should die before its arrival: William sent another fleet to protect the galleons; but it arrived too late for that service, and the nation loudly exclaimed against the tardiness of the equipment: his catholic majesty recovered from his disorder, contrary to the expectation of his people; but continued in such an enfeebled and precarious state of health, that a relapse was every moment apprehended. In the latter end of July, king William embarked for Holland, on pretence of enjoying a recess from business, which was necessary to his constitution: he was glad of an opportunity to withdraw himself for some time from a kingdom in which he had been exposed to such opposition and chagrin; but the real motive of his voyage was a design of treating with the French king, remote from the observation of those who might have penetrated into the nature of his negociation; he had appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence; and, as one of the number, nominated the earl of Marlborough, who had regained his favor, and been constituted governor of the duke of Gloucester. At his majesty's departure, sealed orders were left with the ministry, directing that 16,000 men should be retained in the service, notwithstanding the vote of the commons, by which the standing army was limited to 10,000: he alleged, that the apprehension of troubles, which might arise at the death of king Charles, induced him to transgress this limitation; and he hoped that the new parliament would be more favorable: his enemies, however, made a fresh handle of this step, to depreciate his character in the eyes of the people.

13. Having assisted at the assembly of the States-General, and given audience to divers ambassadors at the Hague, he repaired to his house at Loo, attended by the earls of Essex, Portland, and Selkirk: there he was visited by count Tallard, the French minister, who had instructions to negotiate the treaty concerning the Spanish succession. The earl of Portland, by his majesty's order, had communicated to secretary Vernon the principal conditions which the French king proposed: he himself wrote a letter to lord chancellor Somers, desiring his advice with regard to the propositions, and full powers under the great seal, with blanks to be filled up occasionally, that he might immediately begin the treaty with count Tallard: at the same time, he strictly enjoined secrecy: the purport of Portland's letter was imparted to the duke of Shrewsbury and Mr. Montagu, who consulted with the chancellor and Vernon on the subject; and the chancellor wrote an answer to the king, as the issue of their joint deliberation; but before it reached his majesty, the first treaty of partition was signed by the earl of Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson. The contracting powers agreed, that, in case the king of Spain should die without issue, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with the places depending on the Spanish monarchy, and situated on the coast of Tuscany or the adjacent islands, the marquisate of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, all places on the French side of the Pyrenees, or the other mountains of Navarre, Alva, or Biscay, on the other side of the province of Guipuscoa, with all the ships, vessels, and stores, should devolve on the dauphin, in consideration of his right to the crown of Spain, which, with all its other dependencies, should descend to the electoral prince of Bavaria, under the guardianship of his father: that the duchy of Milan should be settled on the emperor's second son, the archduke Charles: that this treaty should be communicated to the emperor and the elector of Bavaria by the king of England and the States-General: that if either should refuse to agree to this partition, his proportion should remain in sequestration, until the dispute could be accommodated: that in case the electoral prince of Bavaria should die before his father, then the elector and his other heirs should succeed him in those dominions; and, should the archduke reject the duchy of Milan, they agreed that it should be sequestered, and governed by the prince of Vaudemont. It may be necessary to observe, that Philip IV. father to the present king of Spain, had settled his crown by will on the emperor's children; that the dauphin was son to Maria Theresa, daughter of the same monarch, whose right to the succession Louis had renounced in the most solemn manner; as for the electoral prince of Bavaria, he was grandson to a daughter of Spain. This treaty of partition was one of the most impudent schemes of encroachment that tyranny and injustice ever planned: Louis, who had made a practice of sacrificing all ties of honor and good faith to the interest of his pride, vanity, and ambition, foresaw that he should never be able to accomplish his designs on the crown of Spain while William was left at liberty to form another confederacy against them: he therefore resolved to amuse him with a treaty, in which he should seem to act as umpire in the concerns of Europe: he knew that William was too much of a politician to be restricted by notions of private justice; and that he would make no scruple to infringe the laws of particular countries, or even the rights of a single nation, when the balance of power was at stake: he judged right in this particular: the king of England lent a willing ear to his proposals; and engaged in a plan for dismembering a kingdom, in despite of the natives, and in violation of every law human or divine.

14. While the French king cajoled William with this negotiation, the marquis d'Harcourt, his ambassador to Spain, was engaged in a game of a different nature at Madrid. The queen of Spain, suspecting the designs of France, exerted all her interest in behalf of the king of the Romans, to whom she was nearly related: she new-modelled the council, bestowed the government of Milan on prince Vaudemont, and established the prince of Hesse Darmstadt as viceroy of Catalonia: notwithstanding all her efforts, she could not prevent the French minister from acquiring some influence in the Spanish councils: he was instructed to procure the succession of the crown for one of the dauphin's sons, or at least to hinder it from devolving on the emperor's children: with a view to give weight to his negotiations, the French king ordered an army of 60,000 men to advance towards the frontiers of Catalonia and Navarre, while a great number of ships and galleys cruised along the coast, and entered the harbors of Spain. Harcourt immediately began to form his party; he represented that Philip IV. had no power to dispose of his crown against the laws of nature and the constitution of the realm; that, by the order of succession, the crown ought to descend to the children of his daughter, in preference to more distant relations; that, if the Spaniards would declare in favor of the dauphin's second son, the duke of Anjou, they might train him up in the manners and customs of their country: when he found them averse to this proposal, he assured them his master would approve of the electoral prince of Bavaria rather than consent to the succession's devolving on a son of the emperor; nay, he hinted, that if they would choose a sovereign among themselves, they might depend on the protection of his most christian majesty, who had no other view than that of preventing the house of Austria from becoming too formidable to the liberties of Europe. The queen of Spain, having discovered the intrigues of this minister, conveyed the king to Toledo, on pretence that the air of Madrid was prejudicial to his health: Harcourt immediately took the alarm: he supposed her intention was to prevail on her husband, in his solitude, to confirm the last will of his father; and his doubts were all removed, when he understood that the count de Harrach, the imperial ambassador, had privately repaired to Toledo: he forthwith took the same road, pretending to have received a memorial from his master, with a positive order to deliver it into the king's own hand: he was given to understand, that the management of foreign affairs had been left to the care of cardinal Corduba at Madrid, and that the king's health would not permit him to attend to business: the purport of the memorial was, an offer of French force to assist in raising the siege of Ceuta in Barbary, which the Moors had lately undertaken; but this offer was civilly declined. Harcourt, not yet discouraged, redoubled his efforts at Madrid, and found means to engage cardinal Portocarrero in the interests of his master: in the mean time Louis concluded an alliance with Sweden, under the pretext of preserving and securing the common peace by such means as should be adjudged most proper and convenient. During these transactions, king William was not wanting in his endeavors to terminate the war in Hungary, which had raged fifteen years without intermission: about the middle of August, lord Paget and Mr. Colliers, ambassadors from England and Holland, arrived in the Turkish camp near Belgrade; and a conference being opened under their mediation, the peace of Carlowitz was signed on the twenty-sixth of January: by this treaty, the emperor remained in possession of all his conquests: Caminieck was restored to the Poles; all the Morea, with several fortresses in Dalmatia, were ceded to the Venetians; and the czar of Mus-

covy retained Azoph during a truce of two years; so that the Turks, by this pacification, lost great part of their European dominions: the cardinal primate of Poland, who had strenuously adhered to the prince of Conti, was prevailed on to acknowledge Augustus; and the commotions in Lithuania being appeased, peace was established through all christendom.

15. In the beginning of December the king arrived in England, where a new parliament had been chosen, and prorogued on account of his majesty's absence, which was prolonged by contrary winds and tempestuous weather: his ministry had been at very little pains to influence the elections, which generally fell on men of revolution-principles, though they do not seem to have been much devoted to the person of their sovereign; yet their choice of Sir Thomas Lyttleton for speaker seemed to presage a session favorable to the ministry. The two houses being convened on the sixth of December, the king, in his speech, observed that the safety, honor, and happiness of the kingdom would in a great measure depend on the strength which they should think proper to maintain by sea and land: he desired they would make some farther progress in discharging the national debt; contrive effectual expedients for employing the poor; pass good bills for the advancement of trade and the discouragement of profaneness; and act with unanimity and despatch. The commons of this new parliament were so irritated at the king's presuming to maintain a greater number of troops than their predecessors had voted, that they resolved he should feel the weight of their displeasure: they omitted the common compliment of an address; they resolved that all the forces of England, in English pay, exceeding 7000 men, should be forthwith disbanded, and also those in Ireland exceeding 12,000; and that those retained should be his majesty's natural-born subjects: a bill was brought in on these resolutions, and prosecuted with peculiar eagerness, to the unspeakable mortification of king William, who was not only extremely sensible of the affront, but also particularly chagrined to see himself disabled from maintaining his Dutch guards, and the regiments of French refugees, to which he was uncommonly attached: before the meeting of the parliament, the ministry gave him to understand, that they should be able to procure a vote for 10,000 or 12,000; but they would not undertake for a greater number: he professed himself dissatisfied with the proposal, observing that they might as well disband the whole as leave so few : the ministers would not run the risk of losing all their credit by proposing a greater number ; and, having received no directions on this subject, sat silent when it was debated in the house of commons.

16. Such was the indignation of William, kindled by this conduct of his ministry and his parliament, that he threatened to abandon the government, and had actually penned a speech to be pronounced to both houses on that occasion ; but he was diverted from this purpose by his ministry and confidants, and resolved to pass the bill by which he had been so much offended : accordingly, when it was ready for the royal assent, he went to the house of peers, where having sent for the commons, he told them, that although he might think himself unkindly used in being deprived of his guards, which had constantly attended him in all his actions ; yet, as he believed nothing could be more fatal to the nation than any distrust or jealousy between him and his parliament, he was come to pass the bill, according to their desire : at the same time, for his own justification, and in discharge of the trust reposed in him, he declared that in his own judgment the nation was left too much exposed, and that it was incumbent on them to provide such a strength as might be necessary for the safety of the kingdom. They thanked him, in an address, for this undeniable proof of his readiness to comply with the desires of his parliament : they assured him, he should never have reason to think the commons were undutiful or unkind ; for they would, on all occasions, stand by, and assist him in the preservation of his sacred person, and in the support of his government, against all his enemies whatsoever : the lords presented an address to the same effect ; and the king assured both houses he entertained no doubts of their loyalty and affection : he forthwith issued orders for reducing the army to the number of 7000 men, to be maintained in England under the name of guards and garrisons ; and, hoping the hearts of the commons were now mollified, he made another effort in favor of his Dutch guards, whom he could not dismiss without the most sensible regret : lord Ranelagh was sent with a written message to the commons, giving them to understand that the necessary preparations were made for transporting the guards who came with him into England, and that they should embark immediately, unless, out of consideration to him, the house should be dis-

- posed to find a way for continuing them longer in the service; a favor which his majesty would take very kindly. The commons, instead of complying with his inclination, presented an address, in which they professed unspeakable grief, that he should propose any thing to which they could not consent with due regard to the constitution, which he had come over to restore, and so often hazarded his royal person to preserve: they reminded him of the declaration, in which he had promised that all the foreign forces should be sent out of the kingdom: they observed, that nothing conduced more to the happiness and welfare of the nation, than an intire confidence between the king and people, which could no way be so firmly established as by entrusting his sacred person with his own subjects, who had so eminently signalised themselves during the late long and expensive war: they received a soothing answer to this address, but remained firm to their purpose, in which the king was fain to acquiesce; and the Dutch guards were transported to Holland. At a time when they declared themselves so well pleased with their deliverer, such an opposition, in an affair of very little consequence, savored more of clownish obstinacy than of patriotism: in the midst of all their professions of regard, they entertained a national prejudice against himself and all the foreigners in his service: even in the house of commons his person was treated with great disrespect in virulent insinuations: they suggested that he neither loved nor trusted the English nation; that he treated the natives with the most disagreeable reserve, and chose his confidants from the number of strangers that surrounded him; that, after every session of parliament, he retired from the kingdom, to enjoy an indolent and inglorious privacy with a few favorites. These suggestions were certainly true: he was extremely disgusted with the English, whom he considered as malicious, ignorant, and ungrateful; and he took no pains to disguise his sentiments.

17. The commons, having effected a dissolution of the army, voted 15,000 seamen and a proportionable fleet for the security of the kingdom: they granted £1,484,015, for the services of the year, to be raised by a tax of three shillings in the pound on lands, personal estates, pensions, and offices. A great number of priests and Roman catholics, who had been frightened away by the revolution, were now encouraged by the treaty of Ryswick to return, and appeared in all public places of London and Westminster with remarkable

ffrontery : the enemies of the government whispered about, that the treaty contained a secret article in favor of those who professed that religion ; and some did not even scruple to insinuate that William was a papist in his heart : the commons, alarmed at the number and insolence of those religionists, desired the king, in an address, to remove by proclamation all papists and nonjurors from the city of London and parts adjacent, and put the laws in execution against them, that the wicked designs they were always hatching might be effectually disappointed : the king gratified them in their request of a proclamation, which was not much regarded ; but a remarkable law was enacted against papists in the course of the ensuing session. The old East-India company, about this period, petitioned the lower house to make some provision that their corporation might subsist for the residue of the term of twenty-one years, granted by his majesty's charter ; that the payment of the five pounds per cent. by the late act for settling the trade to the East-Indies, might be settled and adjusted in such a manner, as not to remain a burden on the petitioners ; and that such farther considerations might be had for their relief, and for the preservation of the East-India trade, as should be thought reasonable : a bill was brought in on the subject of this petition, but rejected at the second reading : discontents had arisen to such a height, that some members began to assert they were not bound to maintain the votes and credit of the former parliament ; and, on this maxim, would have contributed their interest towards a repeal of the act made in favor of the new company ; but such a scheme was of too dangerous consequence to the public credit to be carried into execution.<sup>6</sup>

18. That spirit of peevishness which could not be gratified with this sacrifice, produced an inquiry into the management of naval affairs, which was aimed at the earl of Orford, a nobleman whose power gave umbrage, and whose wealth excited envy : he officiated both as treasurer of the navy and lord commissioner of the admiralty, and seemed to have forgotten the sphere from which he had risen to title and office [1699.] : the commons drew up an address, complaining of some unimportant articles of mismanagement in the conduct of the navy, and the earl was wise enough to avoid farther prosecution by resigning his employments. On the fourth of May the king closed the session, with a short speech, hinting dissatisfaction at their having neglected to consider some points which he had recommended to their attention ; and the parliament was prorogued to the first of June :<sup>7</sup> in a little time after this prorogation, his majesty appointed a regency ;<sup>8</sup> and on the second of June embarked for Holland.

19. In Ireland nothing of moment was transacted : the parliament of that kingdom passed an act for raising £120,000 on lands, tenements, and hereditaments, to defray the expense of maintaining 12,000 men, who had been voted by the commons of England when the assembly was prorogued : a new commission afterwards arrived at Dublin, constituting the duke of Bolton, the earls of Berkley and Galway, lords justices of Ireland. The clamor in Scotland increased against the ministry, who had disowned their company, and in a great measure defeated the design from which they had promised themselves such heaps of treasure : notwithstanding the discouragements to which their company had been exposed, they fitted out two of four large ships which had been built at Hamburg for their service : these were laden with a cargo for traffic, with some artillery and military stores ; and the adventurers embarking, to the number of 1200, sailed from the frith of Edinburgh, with some tenders, on the seventeenth of July in the preceding year : at Madeira they took in a supply of wine, and then steered to Crab-Island in the neighborhood of St. Thomas, lying between Santa-Cruz and Porto-Rico : their design was to take possession of this little island ; but, when they entered the road, they saw a large tent pitched on the strand, and the Danish colors flying : finding themselves anticipated in this quarter, they directed their course to the coast of Darien, where they treated with the natives for the establishment of their colony; and taking possession of the ground, to which they gave the name of Caledonia, began to execute their plan of erecting a town under the appellation of New Edinburgh, by the direction of their council, consisting of Paterson the projector, and six other directors: they had no sooner completed their settlement, than they wrote a letter to the king, containing a detail of their proceedings: they pretended they had received undoubted intelligence, that the French intended to make a settlement on that coast; and that their colony would be the means of preventing the evil consequences which might arise to his majesty's kingdom and dominions from the execution of such a scheme: they acknowledged his goodness in granting those privileges by which their company was established; they implored the continuance of his royal favor and protection, as they had punctually adhered to the conditions of the act of parliament, and the patent they had obtained.

<sup>7</sup> About the latter end of March, the earl of Warwick and lord Mohun were tried by their peers in Westminster-hall for the murder of captain Richard Coote, who had been killed in a midnight combat of three on each side : Warwick was found guilty of manslaughter, and Mohun acquitted. Villiers, earl of Jersey, who had been sent ambassador to France, was appointed secretary of state in the room of the duke of Shrewsbury : this nobleman was created lord chamberlain : the earl of Manchester was sent ambassador extraordinary to France ; the earl of Pembroke was declared lord president of the council ; and lord viscount Lonsdale keeper of the privy seal.

20. By this time, however, the king was resolved to crush them effectually: he understood that the greater part of their provisions had been consumed before they set sail from Scotland, and foresaw that they must be reduced to a starving condition, if not supplied from the English colonies: that they might be debarred of all such assistance, he sent orders to the governors of Jamaica, and the other English settlements in America, to issue proclamations, prohibiting, under the severest penalties, all his majesty's subjects from holding any correspondence with the Scottish colony, or assisting it in any shape with arms, ammunition, or provision; on pretence that they had not communicated their design to his majesty, but had peopled Darien, in violation of the peace subsisting between him and his allies. Their colony was, doubtless, a very dangerous encroachment on the Spaniards, as it would have commanded the passage between Porto-Bello and Panama, and divided the Spanish empire in America: the French king complained of the invasion, and offered to supply the court of Madrid with a fleet to dislodge the interlopers: Colonna, marquis de Canales, the Spanish ambassador at the court of London, presented a memorial to king William, remonstrating against the settlement of this colony, as a mark of disregard and a breach of the alliance between the two crowns; and declaring that his master would take proper measures against such hostilities. The Scots affirmed, that the natives of Darien were a free people, whom the Spaniards had in vain attempted to subdue; that, therefore, they had an original and incontrovertible right to dispose of their own lands, part of which the company had purchased for a valuable consideration: but there was another cause more powerful than the remonstrances of the Spanish court, to which this colony fell a sacrifice; and that was the jealousy of the English traders and planters: Darien was said to be a country abounding with gold, which would in a little time enrich the adventurers: the Scots were known to be an enterprising and pertinacious people; and their harbor near Golden-Island was already declared a free port: the English apprehended that their planters would be allured into this new colony by the double prospect of finding gold and plundering the Spaniards; that the buccaneers in particular would choose it as their chief residence; that the plantations of England would be deserted; that Darien would become another Algiers; and that the settlement would produce a rupture with Spain, in consequence of which the English effects in that kingdom would be confiscated: the Dutch too are said to have been jealous of a company, which in time might have proved their competitors in the illicit commerce to the Spanish main; and to have hardened the king's heart against the new settlers, whom he abandoned to their fate, notwithstanding the repeated petitions and remonstrances of their constituents. Famine compelled the first adventurers to quit the coast; a second recruit of men and provisions was sent thither from Scotland; but one of their ships, laden with provision, being burnt by accident, they likewise deserted the place; another reinforcement arrived, and being better provided than the two former, might have maintained their footing, but they were soon divided into factions that rendered all their schemes abortive: the Spaniards advanced against them; when, finding themselves incapable of withstanding the enemy; they solicited a capitulation, by virtue of which they were permitted to retire. Thus vanished all the golden dreams of the Scottish nation, which had engaged in this design with incredible eagerness, and even embarked a greater sum of money than ever they had advanced on any other occasion: they were now not only disappointed in their expectations of wealth and affluence; but a great number of families were absolutely ruined by the miscarriage of the design, which they imputed solely to the conduct of king William: the whole kingdom of Scotland seemed to join in the clamor that was raised against their sovereign; taxed him with double dealing, inhumanity, and base ingratitude to a people who had lavished their treasure and best blood in support of his government, and in the gratification of his ambition; and had their power been equal to their animosity, in all probability a rebellion would have ensued.

21. William, meanwhile, enjoyed himself at Loo, where he was visited by the duke of Zell, with whom he had long cultivated an intimacy of friendship: during his residence in this place, the earl of Portland and the grand pensionary of Holland frequently conferred with the French ambassador, count Tallard, on the subject of the Spanish succession. The first plan of the partition being defeated by the death of the young prince of Bavaria, they found it necessary to concert another, and began a private negotiation for that purpose: the court of Spain, apprised of their intention, sent a written remonstrance to Mr. Stanhope, the English minister at Madrid, expressing their resentment at this unprecedented method of proceeding, and desiring that a stop might be put to those intrigues, seeing the king of Spain would of himself take the necessary steps of preserving the public tranquillity in case he should die without heirs of his body: a representation of the same kind was made to the ministers of France and Holland; the marquis de Canales, the Spanish ambassador at London, delivered a memorial to the lords justices, couched in the most virulent terms, against this transaction, and even appealing from the king to the parliament: this Spaniard was pleased with an opportunity to insult king William, who hated his person, and had forbid him the court, on account of his appearing covered in his majesty's presence. The regency had no sooner communicated this paper to the king, than he ordered the ambassador to quit the kingdom in eighteen days, and to remain within his own house till the time of his departure: he was likewise given to understand that no writing would be received from him or any of his domestics: Mr. Stanhope was directed to complain at Madrid of the affront offered to his master, which he styled an insolent and saucy attempt to stir up sedition in the kingdom, by appealing to the people and parliament of England against his majesty: the court of Spain justified what their minister had done, and in their turn ordered Mr. Stanhope to leave their dominions: Don Bernardo de Quiros, the Spanish ambassador in Holland, prepared a memorial on the same subject to the States-General, which however they refused to accept. These remonstrances did not interrupt the negotiation, in which Louis was so eager, that he complained of William, as if he had not employed his whole influence in prevailing on the Dutch to signify their accession to the articles agreed on by France and England; but his Britannic majesty found means to remove this jealousy.

22. About the middle of October, William returned to England, and conferred on the duke of Shrewsbury the office of chamberlain, vacant since the resignation of Sunderland: Mr. Montagu at the same period resigned his seat at the treasury-board, together with the chancellorship of the exchequer; either foreseeing uncommon difficulty in managing a house of commons, after they had been dismissed in ill humor; or dreading the interest of his enemies, who might procure a vote that his two places were inconsistent. The king opened the session of parliament on the sixteenth of November with a long speech, advising a farther provision for the safety of the kingdom by sea and land, as well as the repairs of ships and fortifications; exhorting the commons to make good the deficiencies of the funds, discharge the debts of the nation, and provide the necessary supplies: he recommended some good bill for the more effectual preventing and punishing unlawful and clandestine trading; and expressed a desire that some method should be taken for employing the poor, which were become a burden to the kingdom: he assured them, his resolutions were to countenance virtue and discourage vice; and that he would decline no difficulties and dangers, where the welfare and prosperity of the nation might be concerned: he concluded with these words:— ‘Since then our aims are only for the general good, let us act with confidence in one another; which will not fail, with God’s blessing, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flourishing people.’ The commons were now become wanton in their disgust: though they had received no real provocation, they resolved to mortify him with their proceedings: they affected to put odious interpretations on the very harmless expression of, ‘let us act with confidence in one another.’ Instead of an address of thanks, according to the usual custom, they presented a sullen remonstrance, complaining that a jealousy and disgust had been raised of their duty and affection ; and desiring he would show marks of his high displeasure towards all persons who had presumed to misrepresent their proceedings to his majesty. He declared, in his answer, that no person had ever dared to misrepresent their proceedings ; and, that if any should presume to impose on him by such calumnies, he would treat them as his worst enemies.

23. The house was not in a humor to be appeased with soothing promises and protestations ; they determined to distress him by prosecuting his ministers. During the war, the colonies of North America had grown rich by piracy : one Kidd, the master of a sloop, undertook to suppress the pirates, provided the government would furnish him with a ship of thirty guns, well manned : the board of admiralty declaring that such a number of seamen could not be spared from the public service, Kidd was equipped by the private subscription of the lord chancellor, the duke of Shrewsbury, the earls of Romney, Orford, and Bellamont, Sir Edward Harrison, and colonel Livingstone, of New York : the king promised to contribute one half of the expense, and reserved to himself one-tenth of the profits ; but he never advanced the money. Kidd, being thus equipped, and provided with a commission to act against the French, as well as to make war on certain pirates therein mentioned by name, set sail from Plymouth ; but, instead of cruising on the coast of America, he directed his course to the East-Indies, where he himself turned pirate, and took a rich ship belonging to the Moors : having divided his booty with his crew, ninety of whom left him in order to join other adventurers, he burned his own ship, and sailed with his prize to the West-Indies : there he purchased a sloop, in which he steered for North-America, leaving part of his men in the prize, to remain in one of the Leeward-Islands, until they should receive farther instructions : arriving on the coast of New York, he sent one Emmet to make his peace with the earl of Bellamont, the governor of that province, who inveigled him into a negociation, in the course of which he was apprehended : then his lordship sent an account of his proceedings to the secretary of state, desiring that he would send for the prisoners to England, as there was no law in that colony for punishing piracy with death, and the majority of the people favored that practice : the admiralty, by order of the lords justices, despatched the ship Rochester to bring home the prisoners and their effects ; but, after having been tossed for some time with tempestuous weather, this vessel was obliged to return to Plymouth in a shattered condition. This incident furnished the malcontents with a color to paint the ministry as the authors and abettors of a piratical expedition, which they wanted to screen from the cognisance of the public: the old East-India company had complained to the regency, of the capture made by Kidd in the East-Indies, apprehending, as the vessel belonged to the Moors, they should be exposed to the resentments of the mogul: in the beginning of December, this subject being brought abruptly into the house of commons, a motion was made that the letters patent granted to the earl of Bellamont and others, of pirates' goods, were dishonorable to the king, against the laws of nations, contrary to the laws and statutes of the land, invasive of property, and destructive of trade and commerce. A warm debate ensued, in the course of which some members declaimed with great bitterness against the chancellor and the duke of Shrewsbury, as partners in a piratical scheme; but these imputations were refuted, and the motion was rejected by a great majority: not but they might have justly stigmatised the expedition as a little mean adventure, in which those noblemen had embarked with a view to their own private advantage.

24. While this affair was in agitation among the commons, the attention of the upper house was employed on the case of Dr. Watson, bishop of St. Davids: this prelate was supposed to have paid a valuable consideration for his bishopric; and, after his elevation, had sold the preferments in his gift with a view of being reimbursed: he was accused of simony; and, after a solemn hearing before the archbishop of Canterbury and six suffragans, convicted and deprived: then he pleaded his privilege; so that the affair was brought into the house of lords, who refused to own him as a peer after he had ceased to be a bishop: thus disappointed, he had recourse to the court of delegates, by whom the archbishop's sentence was confirmed. The next effort that the commons made, with a view of mortifying king William, was to raise a clamor against Dr. Burnet, bishop of Sarum: he was represented in the house as a very unfit preceptor for the duke of Gloucester, both as a Scottish man, and author of that pastoral letter which had been burned by order of the parliament, for asserting that William had a right to the crown from conquest: a motion was made for addressing his majesty that this prelate might be dismissed from his employment, but rejected by a great majority. Burnet had acted with uncommon integrity in accepting the trust: he had declined the office, which he was in a manner forced to accept: he had offered to resign his bishopric, thinking the employment of a tutor would interfere with the duty of a pastor: he insisted on the duke's residence all the summer at Windsor, which is in the diocese of Sarum; and added to his private charities the whole income of his new office.

25. The circumstance on which the anti-courtiers built their chief hope of distressing or disgracing the government, was the inquiry into the Irish forfeitures, which the king had distributed among his own dependents: the commissioners appointed by parliament to examine these particulars, were Annesley, Trenchard, Hamilton, Langford, the earl of Drogheda, Sir Francis Brewster, and Sir Richard Leving: the first four were actuated by all the virulence of faction; the other three were secretly guided by ministerial influence. They began their inquiry in Ireland; and proceeded with such severity, as seemed to flow rather from resentment to the court than from a love of justice and abhorrence of corruption: they in particular scrutinised a grant of an estate which the king had made to Mrs. Villiers, now countess of Orkney; so as to expose his majesty's partiality for that favorite, and subject him to an additional load of popular odium: in the course of their examination, the earl of Drogheda, Leving, and Brewster opposed the rest of the commissioners in divers articles of the report, which they refused to sign; and sent over a memorial to the house of commons, explaining their reasons for dissenting from their colleagues: by this time, however, they were considered as hirelings of the court, and no regard was paid to their representations: the others delivered their report, declaring that £1,500,000 might be raised from the sale of the confiscated estates; and a bill was brought in for applying them to the use of the public: a motion being made to reserve a third part for the king's disposal, it was over-ruled: then the commons passed an extraordinary vote, importing that they would not receive any petition from any person whatsoever concerning the grants; and that they would consider the great services performed by the commissioners appointed to inquire into the forfeited estates: they resolved, that the four commissioners who had signed the report had acquitted themselves with understanding, courage, and integrity; and that Sir Richard Leving, as author of groundless and scandalous aspersions cast on his four colleagues, should be committed prisoner to the Tower: they afterwards came to the following resolution, which was presented to the king in form of an address:—that the procuring and passing those grants had occasioned great debts on the nation, and heavy taxes on the people, and highly reflected on the king's honor; and that the officers and instruments concerned in the same had highly failed in the performance of their trust and duty. The king answered, that he was not only led by inclination, but thought himself obliged in justice to reward those who had served well in the reduction of Ireland, out of the estates forfeited to him by the rebellion in that kingdom: he observed, that as the long war had left the nation much in debt, their taking just and effectual ways for lessening that debt, and supporting public credit, was what, in his opinion, would best contribute to the honor, interest, and safety of the kingdom. This answer kindled a flame of indignation in the house: they forthwith resolved, that the adviser of it had used his utmost endeavors to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the king and his people.

26. They prepared, finished, and passed a bill of resumption: they ordered the report of the commissioners, together with the king's promise and speeches, and the former resolutions of the house touching the forfeited estates in Ireland, to be printed and published for their justification; and they resolved, that the procuring or passing exorbitant grants by any member, now of the privy-council, or by any other that had been a privy-counsellor in this or any former reign, to his use or benefit, was a high crime and misdemeanor: that justice might be done to purchasers and creditors in the act of resumption, thirteen trustees were authorised and empowered to hear and determine all claims relating to those estates, to sell them to the best purchasers; and the money arising from the sale was appropriated to pay the arrears of the army: it passed under the title of a bill for granting an aid to his majesty, by the sale of forfeited and other estates and interests in Ireland; and that it might undergo no alteration in the house of lords, it was consolidated with the money-bill for the service of the year. In the house of lords it produced warm debates; and some alterations were made, which the commons unanimously rejected: they seemed to be now more than ever exasperated against the ministry, and ordered a list of the privy-council to be laid before the house: the lords demanded conferences, which served only to exasperate the two houses against each other; for the peers insisted on their amendments; and the commons were so provoked at their interfering in a money-bill, that they determined to give a loose to their resentment: they ordered all the doors of their house to be shut, that no members should go forth: then they took into consideration the report of the Irish forfeitures, with the list of the privy-counsellors; and a question was moved, that an address should be made to his majesty, to remove John lord Somers, chancellor of England, from his presence and councils for ever: this however was carried in the negative by a great majority. The king was extremely chagrined at the bill, which he considered as an invasion of his prerogative, an insult on his person, and an injury to his friends and servants; and he at first resolved to hazard all the consequences of refusing to pass it into a law; but he was diverted from his purpose by the remonstrances of those in whom he chiefly confided:<sup>9</sup> he could not, however, dissemble his resentment: he became sullen, peevish, and morose; and his enemies did not fail to make use of this additional ill humor, as a proof of his aversion to the English people. Though the motion against the chancellor had miscarried, the commons resolved to address his majesty, that no person who was not a native of his dominions, except his royal highness prince George of Denmark, should be admitted into his majesty's councils in England or Ireland: this resolution was levelled against the earls of Portland, Albemarle, and Galway; but, before the address could be presented, the king went to the house of peers; and having passed the bill which had produced such a ferment, with some others, commanded the earl of Bridgewater, speaker of the house, in the absence of the chancellor, who was indisposed, to prorogue the parliament to the twenty-third of May.

27. In the course of this session [1700.], the commons having prosecuted their inquiry into the conduct of Kidd, brought in a bill for the more effectual suppressing of piracy, which passed into a law: understanding afterwards that Kidd was brought over to England, they presented an address to the king, desiring that he might not be tried, discharged, or pardoned till the next session of parliament, and his majesty complied with their request. Boiling still with indignation against the lord chancellor, who had turned many disaffected persons out of the commission of the peace, the house ordered a bill to be prepared for qualifying justices of the peace; and appointed a committee to inspect the commissions: this, reporting that many dissenters and men of small fortunes, depending on the court, were put into those places, the commons declared, in an address, that it would much conduce to the service of his majesty and the good of this kingdom, that gentlemen of quality and good estates should be restored, and put into the commissions of the peace and lieutenancy; and that men of small estates be neither continued, nor put into the said commissions: the king assured them he was of the same opinion, and that he would give directions accordingly. They were so mollified by this instance of his condescension, that they thanked him in a body for his gracious answer: they passed a bill to exculpate such as had neglected to sign the association, either through mistake, or want of opportunity: having received a petition from the Lancashire clergy, complaining of the insolence and attempts of popish priests, they appointed a committee to inquire how far the laws against popish refugees had been put in execution; and on the report a bill was brought in, complying with the prayer of the petition: it decreed a farther reward to such persons as should discover and convict popish priests and Jesuits; and perpetual imprisonment for those convicted on the oath of one or more witnesses: it enacted, that no person, born after the twenty-fifth of March next ensuing, being a papist, should be capable of inheriting any title of honor or estate within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick on Tweed; and that no papist should be capable of purchasing any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, either in his own name, or in the name of any other person in trust for him: several alterations were made in this first draft, before it was finished and sent up to the lords, some of whom proposed amendments: these, however, were not adopted; and the bill obtained the royal assent, contrary to the expectation of those who prosecuted the measure, on the supposition that the king was a favorer of the papists. After all, the bill was deficient in necessary clauses to enforce execution; so that the law was very little regarded in the sequel.

28. The court sustained another insult from the old East-India company, who petitioned the house that they might be continued by parliamentary authority during the remaining part of the time prescribed in their charter: they, at the same time, published a state of their case, in which they expatiated on the equity of their claims, and magnified the injuries they had undergone: the new company drew up an answer to this remonstrance, exposing the corrupt practices of their adversaries; but the influence of their great patron, Mr. Montagu, was now vanished; the supply was not yet discussed; and the ministry would not venture to provoke the commons, who seemed propitious to the old company, and actually passed a bill in their favor: this, meeting with no opposition in the upper house, was enacted into a law, renewing their establishment; so that now there were two rival companies of merchants trading to the East-Indies. The commons, not yet satisfied with the vexations to which they had exposed their sovereign, passed a bill to appoint commissioners for taking and examining the public accounts; another law was made, to prohibit the use of India silks and stuffs which interfered with the English manufactures; a third, to take off the duties on the exportation of woollen manufactures, corn, grain, meal, bread, and biscuit; and a fourth, in which provision was made for punishing governors, or commanders in chief of plantations and colonies, in case they should commit any crimes or acts of injustice and oppression in the exercise of their administration.

29. The people of Scotland still continued in violent agitation: they published a pamphlet, containing a detail of their grievances, which they in a great measure ascribed to his majesty: a complaint being preferred to the house of commons against this performance, it was voted a false, scandalous, and traitorous libel, and ordered to be burned by the hands of the common hangman: the commons addressed his majesty, to issue his royal proclamation for apprehending the author, printer, and publisher of the said libel; and he complied with their request. The Scottish company had sent up an address to the king, in behalf of some adventurers who were wrongfully detained prisoners in Carthage; but lord Basil Hamilton, who undertook the charge of this petition, was refused admittance to his majesty, on pretence of his being suspected of disaffection to the government: the king, however, wrote to his council for Scotland, that he would demand the enlargement of the prisoners, and countenance any laudable measure that could advance the trade of that kingdom: the directors of the company, not content with this declaration, importuned their lord chancellor, who was in London, to procure access for lord Basil Hamilton; and the ministry took shelter from their solicitations behind a parliamentary inquiry. The subject of the Scottish colony being introduced into the house of lords, where the ministerial influence preponderated, a vehement debate arose, not from any regard to the interest of Scotland, but from mere opposition to the court, which, however, triumphed in the issue: a motion was made, that the settlement of the Scotch colony at Darien was inconsistent with the good of the plantation trade of England, and passed in the affirmative by a small majority: then they presented an address, declaring their sympathy with the losses of their fellow-subjects; and their opinion, that a prosecution of the design must end, not only in far greater disappointments to themselves, but also prove very inconvenient to the trade and quiet of the kingdom: they reminded him of the address of both houses, touching that settlement; and they expressed their approbation of the orders he had sent to the governors of the plantations on this subject. The king, in his answer to the address, in which the commons refused to concur, took the opportunity of exhorting them to consider of a union between the two kingdoms, as a measure, than which nothing could more contribute to their mutual security and advantage: the lords, in pursuance of this advice, prepared a bill, appointing certain commissioners of the realm of England to treat with commissioners of Scotland for the weal of both kingdoms; but it was obstructed in the house of commons, who were determined to thwart every step that might tend to lessen the disgust, or appease the animosity of the Scottish nation. The malcontents insinuated, that the king's opposition to the Scottish company flowed neither from his regard to the interest of England, nor from his punctual observance of treaties with Spain; but solely from his attachment to the Dutch, who maintained an advantageous trade from the island of Curacoa to the Spanish plantations in America, and were apprehensive that the Scottish company would deprive them of this commerce: this interpretation served as fuel to the flame already kindled in Scotland, and industriously blown up by the calumnies of the Jacobites: their parliament adopted the company as a national concern, by voting, that the colony of Caledonia

in Darien was a legal and rightful settlement, which the parliament would maintain and support: on account of this resolution the session was for some time discontinued; but when the Scots understood their new settlement was totally abandoned, their capital lost, and all their hope intirely vanished, the whole nation was seized with a transport of fury: they loudly exclaimed that they had been sacrificed and basely betrayed in that quarter where they were entitled to protection; they concerted an address to the king, couched in a very high strain, representing the necessity of an immediate parliament: it was circulated about the kingdom for subscriptions, signed by a great number of those who sat in parliament, and presented to the king by lord Ross, who with some others was deputed for that purpose. The king told them, they should know his intention in Scotland; and in the mean time adjourned their parliament by proclamation: the people, exasperated at this new provocation, began to form the draft of a second national address, to be signed by the shires and boroughs of the kingdom; but, before this could be finished, the king wrote a letter to the duke of Queensbury and the privy-council of that nation, which was published for the satisfaction of the people: he professed himself grieved at the nation's loss, and willing to grant what might be needful for the relief and ease of the kingdom: he assured them, he had their interest at heart; and that his good subjects should have convincing proofs of his sincere inclination to advance the wealth and prosperity of that his ancient kingdom: he said, he hoped this declaration would be satisfactory to all good men; that they would not suffer themselves to be misled; nor give advantage to enemies and ill-designing persons, ready to seize every opportunity of embroiling the government: he gave them to understand, that his necessary absence had occasioned the late adjournment; but as soon as God should bring him back, their parliament should be assembled. Even this explanation, seconded by all the credit and address of his ministers, failed in allaying the national ferment, which rose to the very verge of rebellion.

30. The king, who, from his first accession to the throne, had veered occasionally from one party to another, according to the circumstances of his affairs and the opposition he encountered, was at this period so incensed and embarrassed by the caprice and insolence of the commons, that he willingly lent an ear to the leaders of the tories, who undertook to manage the parliament according to his pleasure, provided he would part with some of his ministers, who were peculiarly odious to the commons: the person against whom their anger was chiefly directed was the lord chancellor Somers, the most active leader of the whig party: they demanded his dismissal, and the king exhorted him to resign his office; but he refusing to take any step that might indicate a fear of his enemies or a consciousness of guilt, the king sent a peremptory order for the seals by lord Jersey, to whom Somers delivered them without hesitation: they were successively offered to lord chief-justice Holt, and Trevor, the attorney-general, who declined accepting such a precarious office: meanwhile, the king granted a temporary commission to three judges to sit in the court of chancery; and at length bestowed the seals, with the title of lord keeper, on Nathan Wright, one of the sergeants at law, a man but indifferently qualified for the office to which he was now preferred. Though William seemed altogether attached to the tories, and inclined to a new parliament, no person appeared to take the lead in the affairs of government; and, indeed, for some time the administration seemed to be under no particular direction.

31. During the transactions of the last session, the negotiation for a second partition treaty had been carried on in London by the French minister, Tallard, in conjunction with the earls of Portland and Jersey, and was soon brought to perfection: on the twenty-first of February the treaty was signed in London; and on the twenty-fifth of the next month it was subscribed at the Hague by Briord, the French envoy, and the plenipotentiaries of the States-General. By this convention the treaty of Ryswick was confirmed: the contracting parties agreed, that, in case of his catholic majesty's dying without issue, the dauphin should possess, for himself and his heirs, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the islands of St. Stephano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Porto Longone, Piombino, the city and marquisate of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, the duchies of Lorrain and Bar; in exchange for which last, the duke of Lorrain should enjoy the duchy of Milan; but that the county of Biche should remain in sovereignty to the prince of Vaudemont: that the archduke Charles should inherit the kingdom of Spain and all its dependencies in and out of Europe; but, in case of his dying without issue, it should devolve to some other child of the emperor, excepting him who might succeed as emperor or king of the Romans : that this monarchy should never descend to a king of France or dauphin ; and that three months should be allowed to the emperor, to consider whether or not he would accede to this treaty. Whether the French king was really sincere in his professions at this juncture, or proposed this treaty with a view to make a clandestine use of it at the court of Spain for more interested purposes, it is not easy to determine ; at first, however, it was concealed from the notice of the public, as if the parties had resolved to take no step in consequence of it during the life of his catholic majesty.

32. In the beginning of July the king embarked for Holland, after having appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence : on the twenty-ninth of the same month, the young duke of Gloucester, the only remaining child of seventeen which the princess Anne had borne, died of a malignant fever, in the eleventh year of his age : his death was much lamented by the greater part of the English nation, not only on account of his promising talents and gentle behavior, but also, as it left the succession undetermined, and might create disputes of fatal consequence to the nation : the Jacobites openly exulted in an event which they imagined would remove the chief bar to the interest of the prince of Wales ; but the protestants generally turned their eyes on the princess Sophia, electress dowager of Hanover, and grand-daughter of James I. It was with a view to concert the establishment of her succession, that the court of Brunswick now returned the visit of king William. The present state of affairs in England, however, afforded a very uncomfortable prospect : the people were generally alienated from the person and government of the reigning king, on whom they seem to have surfeited : the vigor of their minds was destroyed by luxury and sloth ; the severity of their morals was relaxed by a long habit of venality and corruption : the king's health began to decline, and even his faculties decayed apace : no person was appointed to ascend the throne when it should become vacant : the Jacobite faction alone was eager, vigilant, enterprising, and elate : they despatched Mr. Graham, brother of lord Preston, to the court of St. Germain, immediately after the death of the duke of Gloucester ; they began to bestir themselves all over the kingdom : a report was spread that the princess Anne had privately sent a message to her father; and Britain was once more threatened with civil war, confusion, anarchy, and ruin.

33. In the mean time, king William was not inactive: the kings of Denmark and Poland, with the elector of Brandenburg, had formed a league to crush the young king of Sweden, by invading his dominions on different sides: the Poles actually entered Livonia, and undertook the siege of Riga: the king of Denmark, having demolished some forts in Holstein, the duke of which was connected with Sweden, invested Tonningen: the Swedish minister in England demanded that assistance of William which had been stipulated in a late renewal of the ancient treaty between England and Sweden; the States of Holland were solicited to the same purpose: accordingly, a fleet of thirty sail, English and Dutch, was sent to the Baltic, under the command of Sir George Rooke, who joined the Swedish squadron, and bombarded Copenhagen, to which the Danish fleet had retired: at the same time, the duke of Lunenburg, with the Swedish forces, which happened to be at Bremen, passed the Elbe, and marched to the assistance of the duke of Holstein: the Danes immediately abandoned the siege of Tonningen; and a body of Saxons, who had made an irruption into the territories of the duke of Brunswick, were obliged to retreat in disorder. By the mediation of William, a negociation was begun for a treaty between Sweden and Denmark, which in order to quicken, Charles, the young king of Sweden, made a descent on the isle of Zealand: this was executed with great success: Charles was the first man who landed; and here he exhibited such marks of courage and conduct, far above his years, as equally astonished and intimidated his adversaries: then he determined to besiege Copenhagen; a resolution that struck such terror into the Danes, that they proceeded with redoubled diligence in the treaty, which was brought to a conclusion between Denmark, Sweden, and Holstein, about the middle of August: then the Swedes retired to Schonen, and the squadrons of the maritime powers returned from the Baltic.

34. When the new partition treaty was communicated by the ministers of the contracting parties to the other powers of Europe, it generally met with a very unfavorable construction: Saxony and the northern crowns were still embroiled with their own quarrels, consequently could not give much attention to such a remote transaction: the princes of Germany appeared cautious and dilatory in their answers, unwilling to be concerned in any plan that might excite the resentment of the house of Austria: the elector of Brandenburg, in particular, had set his heart on the regal dignity, which he hoped to obtain from the favor and authority of the emperor: the Italian states were averse to the partition treaty, from their apprehension of seeing France in possession of Naples, and other districts of their country: the duke of Savoy affected a mysterious neutrality, in hopes of being able to barter his consent for some considerable advantage: the Swiss cantons declined acceding as guarantees: the emperor expressed his astonishment that any disposition should be made of the Spanish monarchy without the consent of the present possessor and the states of the kingdom: he observed, that neither justice nor decorum could warrant the contracting powers to compel him, who was the rightful heir, to accept a part of his inheritance within three months, under penalty of forfeiting even that share to a third person not yet named; and he declared, that he could take no final resolution, until he should know the sentiments of his catholic majesty on an affair in which their mutual interest was so nearly concerned. Leopold was actually engaged in a negociation with the king of Spain, who signed a will in favor of his second son Charles; yet he took no measures to support the disposition, either by sending the archduke with a sufficient force to Spain, or by detaching troops into Italy.

35. The people of Spain were exasperated at the insolence of the three foreign powers who pretended to parcel out their dominions: their pride took the alarm, at the prospect of their monarchy's being dismembered; and their grandees repined at the thought of losing so many lucrative governments which they now enjoyed: the king's life became every day more and more precarious, from frequent returns of his disorder: the ministry was weak and divided, the nobility factious, and the people discontented: the hearts of the nation had been alienated from the house of Austria by the insolent carriage and rapacious disposition of the queen Mariana: the French had gained over to their interests the cardinal Portocarrero, the marquis de Montercy, with many other noblemen and persons of distinction: these, perceiving the sentiments of the people, employed their emissaries to raise a general cry that France alone could maintain the succession intire; that the house of Austria was feeble and exhausted, and any prince of that line must owe his chief support to detestable heretics: Portocarrero tampered with the weakness of his sovereign: he repeated and exaggerated all the suggestions; he advised him to consult pope Innocent XII. on this momentous point of regulating the succession: that pontiff, who was a creature of France, having taken the advice of a college of cardinals, determined that the renunciation of Maria Theresa was invalid and null, as being founded on compulsion, and contrary to the fundamental laws of the Spanish monarchy: he, therefore, exhorted king Charles to contribute to the propagation of the faith and the repose of christendom, by making a new will in favor of a grandson of the French monarch: this admonition was seconded by the remonstrances of Portocarrero, and the weak prince complied with the proposal. In the mean time, the king of France seemed to act heartily, as a principal in the treaty of partition: his ministers at foreign courts co-operated with those of the maritime powers, in soliciting the accession of the different potentates in Europe: when count Zinzendorf, the imperial ambassador at Paris, presented a memorial, desiring to know what part France would act should the king of Spain voluntarily place a grandson of Louis on the throne, the marquis de Torcy answered in writing, that his most christian majesty would by no means listen to such a proposal; nay, when the emperor's minister gave them to understand that his master was ready to begin a separate negociation with the court of Versailles touching the Spanish succession, Louis declared he could not treat on that subject without the concurrence of his allies.

36. The nature of the partition treaty was no sooner known in England, than condemned by the most intelligent part of the nation: they first of all complained, that such an important affair should be concluded without the advice of parliament: they observed, that the scheme was unjust, and the execution of it hazardous; that, in concerting the terms, the maritime powers seemed to have acted as partisans of France; for the possession of Naples and the Tuscan ports would subject Italy to her dominion, and interfere with the English trade to the Levant and Mediterranean; while Guipuscoa, on any future rupture, would afford another inlet into the heart of the Spanish dominions: they, for these reasons, pronounced the treaty destructive of the balance of power, and prejudicial to the interest of England. All these arguments were trumpeted by the malcontents, so that the whole kingdom echoed with the clamor of disaffection: Sir Christopher Musgrave, and others of the tory faction, began to think in earnest of establishing the succession of the English crown on the person of the prince of Wales: they are said to have sent over Mr. Graham to St. Germain with overtures to this purpose; and an assurance that a motion would be made in the house of commons, to pass a vote that the crown should not be supported in the execution of the partition treaty. King William was not ignorant of the censure he had undergone, and not a little alarmed to find himself so unpopular among his own subjects: that he might be the more able to bestow his attention effectually on the affairs of England, he resolved to take some measures for the satisfaction of the Scottish nation: he permitted the parliament of that kingdom to meet on the twenty-eighth of October, and wrote a letter to them from his house at Loo, containing an assurance that he would concur in every thing that could be reasonably proposed for maintaining and advancing the peace and welfare of their kingdom: he promised to give his royal assent to such acts as they should frame for the better establishment of the presbyterian discipline; for preventing the growth of popery, suppressing vice and immorality, encouraging piety and virtue, preserving and securing personal liberty, regulating and advancing trade, retrieving the losses, and promoting the interest of their African and Indian companies: he expressed his concern that he could not assert the company's right of establishing a colony at Darien without disturbing the peace of christendom, and entailing a ruinous war on that his ancient kingdom: he recommended unanimity and despatch in raising competent taxes for their own defence; and told them he had thought fit to continue the duke of Queensbury in the office of high commissioner. Notwithstanding this soothing address, the national resentment continued to rage, and the parliament seemed altogether intractable: by this time the company had received certain tidings of the intire surrender of their settlement; and on the first day of the session, they represented to parliament, that for want of due protection abroad, some persons had been encouraged to break in on their privileges even at home: this remonstrance was succeeded by another national address to the king, who told them he could not take any farther notice of that affair, since the parliament was now assembled; and he had already made a declaration, with which he hoped all his faithful subjects would be satisfied: nevertheless, he found it absolutely necessary to practise other expedients for allaying the ferment of that nation: his ministers and their agents bestirred themselves so successfully, that the heats in parliament were intirely cooled, and the outcry of the people subsided into unavailing murmurs: the parliament resolved, that in consideration of their great deliverance by his majesty, and as, next under God, their safety and happiness wholly depended on his preservation and that of his government, they would support both to the utmost of their power, and maintain such forces as should be requisite for those ends: they passed an act for keeping on foot 3000 men for two years, to be maintained by a land-tax: then the commissioner produced the king's letter, desiring to have 1100 men on his own account to the first of June following: they forthwith complied with his request, and were prorogued to the sixth of May: the supernumerary troops were sent over to the States-General; and the earl of Argyle was honored with the title of duke, as a recompense for having concurred with the commissioners in managing this session of parliament.

37. King William had returned to England on the eighteenth of October, not a little chagrined at the perplexities in which he found himself involved; and in the beginning of the next month he received advice that the king of Spain was actually dead: he could not be surprised at this event, which had been so long expected; but it was attended with a circumstance which he had not foreseen: Charles, by his last will, had declared the duke of Anjou, second son of the dauphin, the sole heir of the Spanish monarchy: in case this prince should die without issue, or inherit the crown of France, he willed that Spain should devolve to the duke of Berry; in default of him and children, to the archduke Charles and his heirs; failing of whom, to the duke of Savoy and his posterity: he likewise recommended a match between the duke of Anjou and one of the archduchesses. When this testament was first notified to the French court, Louis seemed to hesitate between his inclination and engagements to William and the States-General: Madame de Maintenon is said to have joined her influence to that of the dauphin, in persuading the king to accept of the will; and Pontchartrain was engaged to support the same measure: a cabinet-council was called in her apartment: the rest of the ministry declared for the treaty of partition; the king affected a kind of neutrality: the dauphin spoke for his son with an air of resolution he had never assumed before: Pontchartrain seconded his argument: Madame de Maintenon asked what the duke of Anjou had done to provoke the king, that he should be barred of his right to that succession: then the rest of the members espoused the dauphin's opinion; and the king owned himself convinced by their reasons: in all probability, the decision of this council was previously settled in private. After the will was accepted, Louis closeted the duke of Anjou, to whom he said, in presence of the marquis des Rois, 'Sir, the king of Spain has made you a king: the grandes demand you; the people wish for you, and I give my consent: remember only you are a prince of France: I recommend to you to love your people, to gain their affection by the lenity of your government, and to render yourself worthy of the throne you are going to ascend.' The new monarch was congratulated on his elevation by all the princes of the blood; nevertheless, the duke of Orleans and his son protested against the will, because the archduke was placed next in succession to the duke of Berry, in bar of their right as descendants of Anne of Austria, whose renunciation could be of no more force than that of Maria Theresa. On the fourth of December the new king set out for Spain, to the frontiers of which he was accompanied by his two brothers.

38. When the will was accepted, the French minister, de Torcy, endeavored to justify his master's conduct to the earl of Manchester, who resided at Paris in the character of ambassador from the court of London: he observed, that the treaty of partition was not likely to answer the end for which it had been concerted: that the emperor had refused to accede; that it was relished by none of the princes to whom it had been communicated; that the people of England and Holland had expressed their discontent at the prospect of France's being in possession of Naples and Sicily; that if Louis had rejected the will, the archduke would have had a double title derived from the former will and that of the late king; that the Spaniards were so averse to the division of their monarchy, there would be a necessity for conquering the whole kingdom before the treaty could be executed; that the ships to be furnished by

Great Britain and Holland would not be sufficient for the purposes of such a war; and it was doubtful whether England and the States-General would engage themselves in a greater expense: he concluded with saying, that the treaty would have been more advantageous to France than the will, which the king accepted purely from a desire of preserving the peace of Europe: his master hoped therefore that a good understanding would subsist between him and the king of Great Britain: the same reasons were communicated by Briod, the French ambassador at the Hague, to the States-General. Notwithstanding this address, they ordered their envoy at Paris to deliver a memorial to the French king, expressing their surprise at his having accepted the will; and their hope, that as the time specified for the emperor's acceding to the treaty was not expired, his most christian majesty would take the affair again into his consideration, and adhere to his engagements in every article. Louis, in his answer to this memorial, which he despatched to all the courts of Europe, declared, that what he chiefly considered was the principal design of the contracting parties, namely, the maintenance of peace in Europe: and that, true to his principle, he only departed from the words, that he might the better adhere to the spirit of the treaty.

39. With this answer he sent a letter to the States, giving them to understand that the peace of Europe was so firmly established by the will of the king of Spain in favor of his grandson, that he did not doubt their approbation of his succession to the Spanish crown: the States observed, that they could not declare themselves on an affair of such consequence without consulting their respective provinces: Louis admitted the excuse, and assured them of his readiness to concur with whatever they should desire for the security of the Spanish Netherlands. The Spanish ambassador at the Hague presented them with a letter from his new master, who likewise notified his accession to all the powers of Europe, except the king of England: the emperor loudly exclaimed against the will, as being more iniquitous than the treaty of partition; and threatened to do himself justice by force of arms: the Spaniards, apprehending that a league would be formed between his imperial majesty and the maritime powers for setting aside the succession of the duke of Anjou, and conscious of their own inability to defend their dominions, resigned themselves intirely to the protection of the French monarch: the towns in the Spanish Netherlands and the duchy of Milan admitted French garrisons ; a French squadron anchored in the port of Cadiz ; and another was detached to the Spanish settlements in the West-Indies : part of the Dutch army that was quartered in Luxemburg, Mons, and Namur, were made prisoners of war, because they would not own the king of Spain, whom their masters had not yet acknowledged : the States were overwhelmed with consternation by this event, especially when they considered their own naked situation, and reflected that the Spanish garrisons might fall on them before they could assemble a body of troops for their defence : the danger was so imminent, that they resolved to acknowledge the king of Spain without farther hesitation, and wrote a letter to the French king for that purpose : this was no sooner received, than orders were issued for sending back their battalions.

40. How warmly soever king William resented the conduct of the French king, in accepting the will so diametrically opposite to his engagements, he dissembled his chagrin ; and behaved with such reserve and apparent indifference, that some people naturally believed he had been privy to the transaction : others imagined that he was discouraged from engaging in a new war by his bodily infirmities, which daily increased ; as well as by the opposition in parliament, to which he should be inevitably exposed : but his real aim was to conceal his sentiments until he should have sounded the opinions of other powers in Europe, and seen how far he could depend on his new ministry. He now seemed to repose his chief confidence in the earl of Rochester, who had undertaken for the tories, and was declared lord-lieutenant of Ireland : lord Godolphin was appointed first commissioner of the treasury ; lord Tankerville succeeded lord Lonsdale, lately deceased, as keeper of the privy-seal ; and Sir Charles Hedges was declared secretary of state in the room of the earl of Jersey ; but the management of the commons was entrusted to Mr. Robert Harley, who had hitherto opposed the measures of the court with equal virulence and ability : these new undertakers, well knowing they should find it very difficult, if not impossible, to secure a majority in the present parliament, prevailed on the king to dissolve it by proclamation : then the sheriffs were changed according to their nomination, and writs issued for a new parliament to meet on the sixth of February. During this interval, count Wratislaw arrived in England as ambassador from the emperor, to explain Leopold's title to the Spanish monarchy, supported by repeated entails and renunciations, confirmed in the most solemn treaties : this minister met with a very cold reception from those who stood at the helm of affairs : they sought to avoid all connexions that might engage their country as a principal in another war on the continent, smarting as they were from the losses and encumbrances which the last had entailed on them and their posterity : they seemed to think that Louis, rather than involve himself in fresh troubles, would give all the security that could be desired for maintaining the peace of Europe ; or even, should this be refused, they saw no reason for Britain's exhausting her wealth and strength to support a chimerical balance, in which her interest was but remotely concerned : it was their opinion, that, by keeping aloof, she might render herself more respectable : her reserve would over-awe contending powers ; they would in their turn sue for her assistance, and implore her good offices ; and, instead of declaring herself a party, she would have the honor to decide as arbitress of their disputes : perhaps they extended this idea too far ; and in all probability their notions were inflamed by a spirit of faction : they hated the whigs as their political adversaries ; and detested the war, because it had been countenanced and supported by the interest of that party. The king believed that a conjunction of the two monarchies of France and Spain would prove fatal to the liberties of Europe ; and that this could not be prevented by any other method than a general union of the other European powers : he certainly was an enthusiast in his sentiments of this equilibrium ; and fully convinced that he himself, of all the potentates in christendom, was the only prince capable of adjusting the balance : the imperial ambassador could not, therefore, be long ignorant of his real purpose, as he conversed with the Dutch favorites, who knew and approved of their master's design ; though he avoided a declaration, until he should have rendered his ministers more propitious to his aim : the true secret, however, of that reserve with which count Wratislaw was treated at his first arrival, was a private negotiation which the king had set on foot with the regency of Spain, touching a barrier in the Netherlands : he proposed that certain towns should be garrisoned with English and Dutch troops, by way of security against the ambitious designs of France ; but the regency were so devoted to the French interest, that they refused to listen to any proposal of this nature. While this affair was in agitation,

William resolved to maintain a wary distance from the emperor ; but when his effort miscarried, the ambassador found him much more open and accessible.<sup>10</sup>

41. The parliament meeting on the sixth, was prorogued to the tenth of February, when Mr. Harley was chosen speaker by a great majority in opposition to Sir Richard Onslow : the king had previously told Sir Thomas Lyttleton, it would be for his service that he should yield his pretensions to Harley at this juncture ; and that gentleman agreed to absent himself from the house on the day of election. The king observed, in his speech, that the nation's loss, in the death of the duke of Gloucester, had rendered it absolutely necessary for them to make farther provision for the succession of the crown in the protestant line ; that the death of the king of Spain had made such an alteration in the affairs of the continent as required their mature deliberation : the rest of his harangue turned on the usual topics of demanding supplies for the ensuing year ; reminding them of the deficiencies and public debts ; recommending to their inquiry the state of the navy and fortifications ; exhorting them to encourage commerce, employ the poor, and proceed with vigor and unanimity in all their deliberations. Though the elections had been generally carried in favor of the tory interest, the ministry had secured but one part of that faction : some of the most popular leaders, such as the duke of Leeds, the marquis of Normanby, the earls of Nottingham, Seymour, Musgrave, Howe, Finch and Showers had been either neglected or found refractory, and resolved to oppose the court measures with all their influence: besides, the French king, knowing that the peace of Europe would in a great measure depend on the resolutions of the English parliament, is said to have distributed great sums of money in England, by means of his minister Tallard, in order to strengthen the opposition in the house of commons: certain it is, the nation abounded, at this period, with the French coins called Louis-d'ors and pistoles; but whether this redundancy was owing to a balance of trade in favor of England, or to the largesses of Louis, we shall not pretend to determine: we may likewise observe, that the infamous practice of bribing electors had never been so flagrant as in the choice of representatives for this parliament: this scandalous traffic had been chiefly carried on by the whig party, and therefore their antagonists resolved to spare no pains in detecting their corruption: Sir Edward Seymour distinguished himself by his zeal and activity; he brought some of these practices to light, and in particular stigmatised the new East-India company for having been deeply concerned in this species of venality: an inquiry being set on foot in the house of commons, several elections were declared void; and divers persons, who had been illegally returned, were first expelled the house, and afterwards detained in prison: yet these prosecutions were carried on with such partiality, as plainly indicated that they flowed rather from party zeal than from patriotism.

42. A great body of the commons had resolved to present an address to his majesty, desiring he would acknowledge the king of Spain; and the motion, in all probability, would have been carried by a considerable majority, had not one bold and lucky expression given such a turn to the debate, as induced the anti-courtiers to desist. One Mr. Monckton, in the heat of his declamation against this measure, said he expected the next vote would be for owning the pretended prince of Wales: though there was little or no connexion between these two subjects, a great many members were startled at the information, and deserted the measure, which was dropped accordingly. The king's speech being taken into consideration, the house resolved to support his majesty and his government; to take such effectual measures as might best conduce to the interest and safety of England, and the preservation of the protestant religion: this resolution was presented in an address to the king, who received it favorably: at the same time he laid before them a memorial he had received from the States-General, and desired their advice and assistance in the points that constituted the substance of this remonstrance: the States gave him to understand, that they had acknowledged the duke of Anjou as king of Spain; that France had agreed to a negotiation, in which they might stipulate the necessary conditions for securing the peace of Europe; and that they were firmly resolved to do nothing without the concurrence of his majesty and their other allies: they therefore begged he would send a minister to the Hague with necessary powers and instructions to co-operate with them in this negotiation: they told him, that in case it should prove ineffectual, or Holland be suddenly invaded by the troops which Louis had ordered to advance towards their frontiers, they relied on the assistance of England, and hoped his majesty would prepare the succors stipulated by treaty, to be used, should occasion require: the memorial was likewise communicated to the house of lords: meanwhile, the commons desired that the treaties between England and the States-General should be laid before their house: these being perused, they resolved on an address, to desire his majesty would enter into such negotiations with the States-General and other potentates, as might most effectually conduce to the mutual safety of Great Britain and the United Provinces, as well as to the preservation of the peace of Europe; and to assure him of their support and assistance, in performance of the treaty subsisting between England and the States-General: this resolution, however, was not carried without great opposition from those who were averse to the nation's involving itself in another war on the continent. The king professed himself extremely well pleased with this address, and told them he would immediately order his ministers abroad to act in concert with the States-General and other powers, for the attainment of those ends they proposed.

43. He communicated to the commons a letter, written by the earl of Melfort to his brother the earl of Perth, governor to the pretended prince of Wales: it had been mislaid by accident, and came to London in the French mail: it contained a scheme for another invasion of England, together with some reflections on the character of the earl of Middleton, who had supplanted him at the court of St. Germain: Melfort was a mere projector, and seemed to have had no other view than that of recommending himself to king James, and bringing his rival into disgrace. The house of lords, to whom the letter was also imparted, ordered it to be printed : next day they presented an address, thanking his majesty for his care of the protestant religion ; desiring all the treaties made since the last war might be laid before them ; requesting him to engage in such alliances as he should think proper for preserving the balance of power in Europe ; assuring him of their concurrence ; expressing their acknowledgement for his having communicated Melfort's letter ; desiring he would give orders for seizing the horses and arms of disaffected persons, for removing papists from London, and for searching after those arms and provisions of war mentioned in the letter : finally, they requested him to equip speedily a sufficient fleet for the defence of himself and his kingdom. They received a gracious answer to this address, which was a farther encouragement to the king to put his own private designs in execution : towards the same end the letter contributed not a little, by inflaming the fears and resentment of the nation against France, which in vain disclaimed the earl of Melfort as a fantastical schemer, to whom no regard was paid at the court of Versailles : the French ministry complained of the publication of this letter, as an attempt to sow jealousy between the two crowns ; and, as a convincing proof of their sincerity, banished the earl of Melfort to Angers.

44. The credit of exchequer-bills was so lowered by the change of the ministry, and the lapse of the time allotted for their circulation, that they fell near twenty per cent. to the prejudice of the revenue, and the discredit of the government in foreign countries : the commons, having taken this affair into consideration, voted that provision should be made from time to time for making good the principal and interest due on all parliamentary funds ; and afterwards passed a bill for renewing the bills of credit, commonly called exchequer-bills : this was sent up to the lords on the sixth of March, and on the thirteenth received the royal assent. The next object that engrossed the attention of the commons was the settlement of the succession to the throne, which the king had recommended to their consideration in the beginning of the session : having deliberated on this subject, they resolved, that for the preservation of the peace and happiness of the kingdom, and the security of the protestant religion, it was absolutely necessary that a farther declaration should be made of the limitation and succession of the crown in the protestant line, after his majesty and the princess, and the heirs of their bodies respectively ; and that farther provision should be first made for the security of the rights and liberties of the people. Mr. Harley moved, that some conditions of government might be settled as preliminaries, before they should proceed to the nomination of the person, that their security might be complete : accordingly, they deliberated on this subject, and agreed to the following resolutions :—that whoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown shall join in communion with the church of England as by law established : that, in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person, not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without the consent of parliament : that no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of the crown shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland without consent of parliament : that, from and after the time that the farther limitation by this act shall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well-governing of this kingdom, which are properly cognisable in the privy-council, by the laws and customs of the realm, shall be transacted there ; and all resolutions taken thereon shall be signed by such of the privy-council as shall advise and consent to the same : that after the limitation shall take effect, no person born out of the kingdom of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, although he be naturalised, and made a denizen, except such as are born of English parents, shall be capable to be of the privy-council, or a member of either house of parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the crown to himself, or to any others in trust for him : that no person who has an office or place of profit under the king, or receives a pension from the crown, shall be capable of serving as member of the house of commons : that, after the limitation shall take effect, judges commissions be made quamdiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established ; but on the address of both houses of parliament, it may be lawful to remove them : that no pardon under the great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the commons in parliament. Having settled these preliminaries, they resolved, that the princess Sophia, duchess dowager of Hanover, be declared the next in succession to the crown of England, in the protestant line, after his majesty, and the princess, and the heirs of their bodies respectively; and, that the farther limitation of the crown be to the said princess Sophia and the heirs of her body, being protestants. A bill being formed on these resolutions, was sent up to the house of lords, where it met with some opposition from the marquis of Normanby; a protest was likewise entered against it by the earls of Huntingdon and Plymouth, and the lords Guildford and Jeffries: nevertheless, it passed without amendments, and on the twelfth of June received the royal assent. The king was extremely mortified at the preliminary limitations, which he considered as an open insult on his own conduct and administration; not but that they were necessary precautions, naturally suggested by the experience of those evils to which the nation had been already exposed, in consequence of raising a foreign prince to the throne of England. As the tories lay under the imputation of favoring the late king's interest, they exerted themselves zealously on this occasion to wipe off the aspersion, and insinuate themselves into the confidence of the people; hoping, that in the sequel they should be able to restrain the nation from engaging too deep in the affairs of the continent, without incurring the charge of disaffection to the present king and government. The act of settlement being passed, the earl of Macclesfield was sent to notify the transaction to the electress Sophia, who likewise received from his hands the order of the garter.

45. The act of succession gave umbrage to all the popish princes who were more nearly related to the crown than this lady, whom the parliament had preferred to all others: the duchess of Savoy, grand-daughter to king Charles I. by her mother, ordered her ambassador, count Maffei, to make a protestation to the parliament of England, in her name, against all resolutions and decisions contrary to her title, as sole daughter to the princess Henrietta, next in succession to the crown of England, after king William and the princess Anne of Denmark: two copies of this protest Maffei sent in letters to the lord-keeper and the speaker of the lower house by two of his gentlemen, and a public notary to attest the delivery; but no notice was taken of the declaration: the duke of Savoy, while his minister was thus employed in England, engaged in an alliance with the crowns of France and Spain, on condition that his catholic majesty should espouse his youngest daughter without a dowry ; that he himself should command the allied army in Italy, and furnish 8000 infantry, with 2500 horse, in consideration of a monthly subsidy of 50,000 crowns.

46. During these transactions, Mr. Stanhope, envoy extraordinary to the States-General, was empowered to treat with the ministers of France and Spain, according to the addresses of both houses of parliament : he represented, that though his most christian majesty had thought fit to deviate from the partition treaty, it was not reasonable that the king of England should lose the effect of that convention ; he therefore expected some security for the peace of Europe, and for that purpose insisted on certain articles, importing that the French king should immediately withdraw his troops from the Spanish Netherlands ; that for the security of England, the cities of Ostend and Nieuport should be delivered into the hands of his Britannic majesty ; that no kingdom, provinces, cities, lands, or places belonging to the crown of Spain should ever be yielded or transferred to the crown of France on any pretence whatever ; that the subjects of his Britannic majesty should retain all the privileges, rights, and immunities, with regard to their navigation and commerce in the dominions of Spain, which they enjoyed at the death of his late catholic majesty ; and also all such immunities, rights, and franchises as the subjects of France or any other power either possess for the present, or may enjoy for the future ; that all treaties of peace and conventions between England and Spain should be renewed ; and that a treaty formed on these demands should be guaranteed by such powers as one or other of the contractors should solicit and prevail on to accede : such likewise were the proposals made by the States-General, with this difference, that they demanded, as cautionary towns, all the strongest places in the Netherlands. Count D'Avaux, the French minister, was so surprised at these exorbitant demands, that he could not help saying they could not have been higher if his master had lost four successive battles : he assured them that his most christian majesty would withdraw his troops from the Spanish Netherlands as soon as the king of Spain should have forces of his own sufficient to guard the country : with respect to the other articles, he could give no other answer, but that he would immediately transmit them to Versailles. Louis was filled with indignation at the insolent strain of those proposals, which he considered as a sure mark of William's hostile intentions: he refused to give any other security for the peace of Europe than a renewal of the treaty of Ryswick; and he is said to have tampered, by means of his agents and emissaries, with the members of the English parliament, that they might oppose all steps tending to a new war on the continent.

47. King William certainly had no expectation that France would close with such proposals, but he was not without hope that her refusal would warm the English nation into a concurrence with his designs: he communicated to the house of commons the demands which had been made by him and the States-General, and gave them to understand that he would from time to time make them acquainted with the progress of the negociation: the commons, suspecting that his intention was to make them parties in a congress which he might conduct to a different end from that which they proposed, resolved to signify their sentiments in the answer to this message: they called for the treaty of partition, which being read, they voted an address of thanks to his majesty for his most gracious declaration, that he would make them acquainted with the progress of the negociation; but they signified their disapprobation of the partition treaty, signed with the great seal of England, without the advice of the parliament, which was then sitting, and productive of ill consequences to the kingdom, as well as to the peace of Europe, as it assigned over to the French king such a large portion of the Spanish dominion: nothing could be more mortifying to the king than this open attack on his own conduct; yet he suppressed his resentment, and without taking the least notice of their sentiments with respect to the partition treaty, assured them, that he should be always ready to receive their advice on the negociation which he had set on foot, according to their desire. The debates in the house of commons on the subject of the partition treaty rose to such violence, that divers members, in declaiming against it, transgressed the bounds of decency: Sir Edward Seymour compared the division, which had been made of the Spanish territories to a robbery on the highway; and Mr. Howe did not scruple to say it was a felonious treaty;—an expression, which the king resented to such a degree, that he declared he would have demanded personal satisfaction with his sword, had he not been restrained by the disparity of condition between himself and the person who had offered such an outrageous insult to his honor. Whether the tories intended to alienate the minds of the nation from all foreign connexions, or to wreak their vengeance on the late ministers, whom they hated as the chiefs of the whig party; certain it is, they now raised a universal outcry against the partition treaty, which was not only condemned in public pamphlets and private conversation, but even brought into the house of lords as an object of parliamentary censure. In the month of March a warm debate on this subject was begun by Sheffield, marquis of Normanby, and carried on with great vehemence by other noblemen of the same faction: they exclaimed against the article by which so many territories were added to the crown of France; they complained that the emperor had been forsaken; that the treaty was not communicated to the privy-council or ministry, but clandestinely transacted by the earls of Portland and Jersey; that the sanction of the great seal had been unjustly and irregularly applied, first to blank powers, and afterwards to the treaty itself: the courtiers replied, that the king had engaged in a treaty of partition at the desire of the emperor, who had agreed to every article, except that relating to the duchy of Milan, and afterwards desired that his majesty would procure for him the best terms he could obtain; above all things recommending secrecy, that he might not forfeit his interest in Spain, by seeming to consent to the treaty; that foreign negotiations being entrusted to the care of the crown, the king lay under no legal obligation to communicate such secrets of state to his council, far less was he obliged to follow their advice; and that the keeper of the great seal had no authority for refusing to apply it to any powers or treaty which the king should grant or conclude, unless they were contrary to law, which had made no provision for such an emergency.<sup>11</sup> The earl of Portland,

<sup>11</sup> In the course of this debate, the earl of Rochester reprehended some lords for speaking disrespectfully of the French king, observing that it was peculiarly incumbent on peers to treat monarchs with decorum and respect, as they derived their dignity from the crown: another affirming that the French king was not only to be respected, but likewise to be feared; a certain lord replied, 'he hoped no man in England need to be afraid of the French king, much less the peer who spoke last, who was too much a friend to that monarch, to fear any thing from his resentment.'

apprehending that this tempest would burst on his head, declared on the second day of the debate, that he had by the king's order communicated the treaty, before it was concluded, to the earls of Pembroke and Marlborough, the lords Lonsdale, Somers, Halifax, and secretary Vernon: these noblemen owned that they had been made acquainted with the substance of it; that when they excepted to some particulars, they were told his majesty had carried the matter as far as it could be advanced, and that he could obtain no better terms; thus assured that every article was already settled, they said they no longer insisted on particulars, but gave their advice that his majesty should not engage himself in any measure that would produce a new war, seeing the nation had been so uneasy under the last. After long debates, and great variety as well as virulence of altercation, the house agreed to an address, in which they disapproved of the partition treaty, as a scheme inconsistent with the peace and safety of Europe, as well as prejudicial to the interest of Great Britain: they complained that neither the instructions given to his plenipotentiaries nor the draft of the treaty itself had been laid before his majesty's council: they humbly besought him, that for the future, he would in all matters of importance, require and admit the advice of his natural-born subjects of known probity and fortune; and that he would constitute a council of such persons, to whom he might impart all affairs which should any way concern him and his dominions:<sup>12</sup> they observed, that interest and natural affection to their country would incline them to every measure that might tend to its welfare and prosperity, whereas strangers could not be so much influenced by these considerations; that their knowlege of the country would render them more capable than foreigners could be of advising his majesty touching the true interests of his kingdom; that they had exhibited such repeated demonstrations of their duty and affection, as must convince his majesty of their zeal in his service; nor could he want the knowlege of persons fit to be employed in all his secret and arduous affairs: finally, as the French king appeared to have violated the treaty of partition, they advised his majesty, in future negotiations with that prince, to proceed with such caution as might imply a real security.

48. The king received this severe remonstrance with his usual phlegm, saying it contained matter of very great moment, and he would take care that all treaties he made should be for the honor and safety of England. Though he deeply felt this affront, he would not alter his conduct towards the new ministers; but he plainly perceived their intention was to thwart him in his favorite measure, and humble him into a dependence on their interest in parliament: on the last day of March, 1701, he imparted to the commons the French king's declaration, that he would grant no other security than a renewal of the treaty of Ryswick; so that the negotiation seemed to be at an end: he likewise communicated two resolutions of the States-General, with a memorial from their envoy in England, relating to the ships they had equipped with a view to join the English fleet, and the succors stipulated in the treaty concluded in the year 1677, which they desired might be sent over with all convenient expedition: the house having considered this message, unanimously resolved to desire his majesty would carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-General, and take such measures therein as might most conduce to their safety: they assured him, they would effectually enable him to support the treaty of 1677, by which England was bound to assist them with 10,000 men, and twenty ships of war, in case they should be attacked. Though the king was nettled at that part of this address, which, by confining him to one treaty, implied their disapprobation of a new confederacy, he discovered no signs of emotion, but thanked them for the assurance they had given, and told them he had sent orders to his envoy at the Hague to continue the conferences with the courts of France and Spain. On the nineteenth of April, the marquis de Torcy delivered to the earl of Manchester, at Paris, a letter from the new king of Spain to his Britannic majesty, notifying his accession to that throne, and expressing a desire of cultivating a mutual friendship with the king and crown of England. How averse soever William might have been to any correspondence of this sort, the earl of Rochester and the new ministers importuned him in such a manner to acknowledge Philip, that he at length complied with their entreaties, and wrote a civil answer to his most catholic majesty: this was a very alarming incident to the emperor, who was bent on a war with the two crowns, and had determined to send prince Eugene with an army into Italy, to take possession of the duchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire : the new pope, Clement XI. who had succeeded to the papacy in the preceding year, was attached to the French interest : the Venetians favored the emperor, but they refused to declare themselves at this juncture.

49. The French king consented to a renewal of the negotiations at the Hague ; but, in the mean time, tampered with the Dutch deputies, to engage them in a separate treaty : finding them determined to act in concert with the king of England, he protracted the conferences, in order to gain time, while he erected fortifications, and drew lines on the frontiers of Holland, divided the princes of the empire by his intrigues, and endeavored to gain over the states of Italy : the Dutch, meanwhile, exerted themselves in providing for their own security : they re-enforced their garrisons, purchased supplies, and solicited succors from foreign potentates : the States wrote a letter to king William, explaining the danger of their situation, professing the most inviolable attachment to the interest of England, and desiring that the stipulated number of troops should be sent immediately to their assistance. The three Scottish regiments, which he had retained in his own pay, were immediately transported from Scotland : the letter of the States-General he communicated to the house of commons, who having taken it into consideration, resolved to assist his majesty to support his allies in maintaining the liberty of Europe, and to provide immediate succors for the States-General, according to the treaty of 1677 : the house of peers, to whom the letter was also communicated, carried their zeal still farther : they presented an address, in which they desired his majesty would not only perform the articles of any former treaty with the States-General, but also engage with them in a strict league offensive and defensive, for their common preservation ; and invite into it all the princes and states that were concerned in the present visible danger arising from the union of France and Spain : they exhorted him to enter into such alliances with the emperor as his majesty should think necessary, pursuant to the ends of the treaty concluded in the year 1689 : they assured him of their hearty and sincere assistance, not doubting that Almighty God would protect his sacred person in so righteous a cause ; and that the unanimity, wealth, and courage of his subjects would carry him with honor and success through all the difficulties of a just war : lastly, they took leave humbly to represent, that the dangers to which his kingdom and allies had been exposed were chiefly owing to the fatal counsels that prevented his majesty's sooner meeting his people in parliament.

50. These proceedings of both houses could not but be very agreeable to the king, who expressed his satisfaction in his answer to each apart: they were the more remarkable, as at this very time considerable progress was made in a design to impeach the old ministry; this deviation, therefore, from the tenor of their former conduct could be owing to no other motive than a sense of their own danger, and resentment against France, which, even during the negotiation, had been secretly employed in making preparations to surprise and distress the States-General. The commons having expressed their sentiments on this subject, resumed the consideration of the partition treaty: they had appointed a committee to examine the journals of the house of lords, and to report their proceedings in relation to the treaty of partition: when the report was made by Sir Edward Seymour, the house resolved itself into a committee, to consider the state of the nation: after warm debates, they resolved, that William, earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the treaty of partition, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor: they ordered Sir John Leveson Gower to impeach him at the bar of the house of lords, and named a committee to prepare the articles of his impeachment: then, in a conference with the lords, they desired to know the particulars of what had passed between the earl of Portland and secretary Vernon, in relation to the partition treaty, as also what other information they had obtained concerning negotiations or treaties of partition of the Spanish monarchy: the lords demurring to this demand, the lower house resolved to address the king, that copies of both treaties of partition, together with all the powers and instructions for negotiating those treaties, should be laid before them: the copies were accordingly produced, and the lords sent down to the commons two papers, containing the powers granted to the earls of Portland and Jersey for signing both treaties of partition: the house afterwards ordered that Mr. secretary Vernon should lay before them all the letters which had passed between the earl of Portland and him in relation to those treaties; and he thought proper to obey their command. Nothing could be more scandalously partial than the conduct of the commons on this occasion: they resolved to screen the earl of Jersey,

Sir Joseph Williamson, and Mr. Vernon, who had been as deeply concerned as any others in that transaction; and pointed all their vengeance against the earls of Portland and Orford, and the lords Somers and Halifax: some of the members even tampered with Kidd, who was now a prisoner in Newgate, to accuse lord Somers as having encouraged him in his piracy: he was brought to the bar of the house, and examined; but he declared that he had never spoken to lord Somers, and that he had no order from those concerned in the ship, but that of pursuing his voyage against the pirates in Madagascar: finding him unfit for their purpose, they left him to the course of law; and he was hanged, with some of his accomplices.

51. Lord Somers, understanding that he was accused in the house of commons of having consented to the partition treaty, desired that he might be admitted and heard in his own defence: his request being granted, he told the house, that when he received the king's letter concerning the partition treaty, with an order to send over the necessary powers in the most secret manner, he thought it would have been taking too much on him to put a stop to a treaty of such consequence, when the life of the king of Spain was so precarious; for, had the king died before the treaty was finished, and he been blamed for delaying the necessary powers, he could not have justified his own conduct, since the king's letter was really a warrant: that, nevertheless, he had written a letter to his majesty, objecting to several particulars in the treaty, and proposing other articles which he thought were for the interest of his country: that he thought himself bound to put the great seal to the treaty when it was concluded: that, as a privy-counsellor, he had offered his best advice, and as chancellor, executed his office according to his duty. After he had withdrawn, his justification gave rise to a long debate, which ended in a resolution, carried by a majority of seven voices, that John lord Somers, by advising his majesty to conclude the treaty of partition, whereby large territories of the Spanish monarchy were to be delivered up to France, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor: votes to the same effect were passed against Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax; and all three were impeached at the bar of the upper house: but the commons, knowing that those impeachments would produce nothing in the house of lords, where the opposite interest predominated, resolved to proceed against the accused noblemen in a more expeditious and effectual way of branding their reputation : they voted and presented an address to the king, desiring he would remove them from his councils and presence for ever, as advisers of a treaty so pernicious to the trade and welfare of England : they concluded, by repeating their assurance, that they would always stand by and support his majesty to the utmost of their power, against all his enemies both at home and abroad. The king, in his answer, artfully overlooked the first part of the remonstrance : he thanked them for their repeated assurances ; and told them he would employ none in his service but such as should be thought most likely to improve that mutual trust and confidence between him and his people, which was so necessary at that conjuncture, both for their own security and the preservation of their allies.

52. The lords, incensed at this step of the commons, which they considered as an insult on their tribunal, and a violation of common justice, drew up and delivered a counter-address, humbly beseeching his majesty that he would not pass any censure on the accused lords until they should be tried on the impeachments, and judgments be given according to the usage of parliament. The king was so perplexed by these opposite representations, that he knew not well what course to follow : he made no reply to the counter-address ; but allowed the names of the impeached lords to remain in the council-books : the commons having carried their point, which was to stigmatise those noblemen, and prevent their being employed for the future, suffered the impeachments to be neglected, until they themselves moved for trial. On the fifth of May the house of lords sent a message to the commons, importing that no articles had as yet been exhibited against the noblemen whom they had impeached : the charge was immediately drawn up against the earl of Orford : him they accused of having received exorbitant grants from the crown ; of having been concerned with Kidd the pirate ; of having committed abuses in managing and victualling the fleet, when it lay on the coast of Spain ; and, lastly, of having advised the partition treaty : the earl, in his own defence declared that he had received no grant from the king, except a very distant reversion, and a present of £10,000, after he had defeated the French at La Hogue ; that in Kidd's affair he had acted legally, and with a good intention towards the public, though to his own loss ; that his accounts with regard to the fleet which he commanded had been examined and passed ; yet he was ready to wave the advantage, and justify himself in every particular ; and he absolutely denied that he had given any advice concerning the treaty of partition. Lord Somers was accused of having set the seals to the powers, and afterwards to the treaties ; of having accepted some grants ; of having been an accomplice with Kidd ; and of having some guilt of partial and dilatory proceedings in chancery : he answered every article in the charge ; but no replication was made by the commons, either to him or to the earl of Orford. When the commons were stimulated by another message from the peers, relating to the impeachments of the earl of Portland and lord Halifax, they declined exhibiting articles against the former, on pretence of respect for his majesty ; but on the fourteenth of June the charge against Halifax was sent up to the lords : he was taxed with possessing a grant in Ireland, without paying the produce of it, according to the law lately enacted concerning those grants ; with enjoying another grant out of the forest of Deane, to the waste of the timber and the prejudice of the navy ; with having held places that were incompatible ; by being at the same time commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer ; and with having advised the two treaties of partition : he answered, that his grant in Ireland was of debts and sums of money, and within the act concerning confiscated estates ; that all he had ever received from it did not exceed £400, which, if he was bound to repay, a common action would lie against him ; but every man was not to be impeached who did not discharge his debts at the very day of payment : he observed, that as his grant in the forest of Deane extended to weedings only, it could occasion no waste of timber, nor prejudice to the navy ; that the auditor's place was held by another person, until he obtained the king's leave to withdraw from the treasury ; that he never saw the first treaty of partition, nor was his advice asked on the subject ; that he had never heard of the second but once before it was concluded, and then he spoke his sentiments freely on the subject. This answer, like the others, would have been neglected by the commons, whose aim was now to evade the trials, had not the lords pressed them by messages to expedite the articles : they even appointed a day for Orford's trial, and signified their resolution to the commons : these desired that a committee of both houses should be named for settling preliminaries, one of which was that the lord to be tried should not sit as a peer ; and the other imported, that those lords impeached for the same matter should not vote in the trial of each other: they likewise desired that lord Somers should be first tried. The lords made no objection to this last demand; but they rejected the proposal of a committee consisting of both houses, alleging, that the commons were parties, and had no title to sit in equality with the judges, or to settle matters relating to the trial; that this was a demand contrary to the principles of law and rules of justice, and never practised in any court or nation: the lords indeed had yielded to this expedient in the popish plot, because it was a case of treason, in which the king's life and safety of the kingdom were concerned, while the people were jealous of the court, and the whole nation was in a ferment; but at present the times were quiet, and the charge amounted to nothing more than misdemeanors; therefore the lords could not assent to such a proposal as was derogatory from their jurisdiction: neither would they agree to the preliminaries; but, on the twelfth of June resolved that no peer impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, should, on his trial, be without the bar; and that no peer impeached could be precluded from voting on any occasion, except in his own trial: divers messages passed between the two houses, the commons still insisting on a committee to settle preliminaries; at length the dispute was brought to a free conference.

53. Meanwhile, the king going to the house of peers, gave the royal assent to the bill of succession: in this speech he expressed his warm acknowledgements for their repeated assurances of supporting him in such alliances as should be most proper for the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and for the security of England and the States-General; he observed that the season of the year was advanced; that the posture of affairs absolutely required his presence abroad; and he recommended despatch of the public business, especially of those matters which were of the greatest importance. The commons thanked him in an address for having approved of their proceedings; they declared they would support him in such alliances as he should think fit to make, in conjunction with the emperor and the States-General, for the peace of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France: then they resumed their dispute with the upper-house. In the free conference, lord Haversham happened to tax the commons with partiality in impeaching some lords and screening others who were equally guilty of the same misdemeanors: Sir Christopher Musgrave and the managers for the commons immediately withdrew: this unguarded sally being reported to the house, they immediately resolved, that John, lord Haversham, had uttered most scandalous reproaches and false expressions, highly reflecting on the honor and justice of the house of commons, tending to a breach in the good correspondence between the two houses, and to the interruption of the public justice of the nation: that the said lord Haversham should be charged before the lords for the said words: that the lords should be desired to proceed in justice against him, and to inflict on him such punishment as so high an offence against the commons did deserve. The commons had now found a pretence to justify their delay, and declared they would not renew the conference until they should have received satisfaction. Lord Haversham offered to submit to a trial; but insisted on their first proving the words which he was said to have spoken: when this declaration was imparted to the commons, they said the lords ought to have censured him in a summary way, and still refused to renew the conference: the lords, on the other hand, came to a resolution, that there should not be a committee of both houses concerning the trial of the impeached lords: then they resolved, that lord Somers should be tried at Westminster-hall on Tuesday, the seventeenth of June, and signified this resolution to the lower house; reminding them, at the same time, of the articles against the earl of Portland: the commons refused to appear, alleging they were the only judges, and that the evidence was not yet prepared: they sent up the reasons of their non-appearance to the house of lords, where they were supported by the new ministry and all the malcontents, and produced very warm debates: the majority carried their point piecemeal, by dint of different votes, against which very severe protests were entered. On the day appointed for the trial, they sent a message to the commons, that they were going to Westminster-hall: the other impeached lords asked leave, and were permitted to withdraw: the articles of impeachment against lord Somers, and his answers, being read in Westminster-hall, and the commons not appearing to prosecute, the lords adjourned to their own house, where they debated concerning the question that was to be put: this being settled, they returned to Westminster-hall; and the question being put, 'that John, lord Somers, be acquitted of the articles of impeachment were equally guilty of the same misdemeanor. Sir Christopher Musgrave and the managers for the commons immediately withdrew: this unguarded sally being reported to the house, they immediately resolved, that John, lord Haversham, had uttered most scandalous reproaches and false expressions, highly reflecting on the honor and justice of the house of commons, tending to a breach in the good correspondence between the two houses, and to the interruption of the public justice of the nation: that the said lord Haversham should be charged before the lords with the said words: that the lords should be desired to proceed in justice against him, and to inflict on him such punishment as so high an offence against the commons deserved. The commons had now found a pretence to justify themselves, and declared they would not renew the conference, unless it should have received satisfaction. Lord Haversham refused to submit to a trial; but insisted on their first proving, &c. what he was said to have spoken: when this evidence was imparted to the commons, they had no other way but to have censured him in a summary way, and then to renew the conference: the lords, on the other hand, came to a resolution, that there should not be a conference between the two houses concerning the trial of the said lord Haversham: and they resolved, that lord Somerset should read in the high-minster-hall on Tuesday, the seventh of the month, the said resolution to the lords: and that the commons, at the same time, of the articles against the said lord Haversham, should be read in the commons: and that the commons refused to appear, and that the evidence was not taken.

sent up the reasons of their opposition to the lords, where they were supported by all the malcontents, and a majority carried their point by the votes, against which the day appointed for discussion, that the

against him, exhibited by the house of commons, and all things therein contained, and that the impeachment be dismissed,' it was carried by a majority of thirty-five. The commons, exasperated at these proceedings, resolved that the lords had refused justice to the commons; that they had endeavored to overturn the right of impeachment lodged in the commons by the ancient constitution of the kingdom; that all the ill consequences which might attend the delay of the supplies given for the preservation of the public peace, and the maintenance of the balance of Europe, would be owing to those who, to procure an indemnity for their own crimes, had used their utmost endeavors to make a breach between the two houses. The lords sent a message to the commons, giving them to understand that they had acquitted lord Somers, and dismissed the impeachment, as nobody had appeared to support the articles; and that they had appointed next Monday for the trial of the earl of Orford: they resolved, that unless the charge against lord Haversham should be prosecuted by the commons before the end of the session, the lords would adjudge him innocent; that the resolutions of the commons on their late votes contained most unjust reflections on the honor and justice of the peers; that they were contrived to cover their affected and unreasonable delays in prosecuting the impeached lords; that they manifestly tended to the destruction of the judicature of the lords, to the rendering trials on impeachments impracticable for the future, and to the subverting the constitution of the English government; that therefore whatever ill consequence might arise from the so long deferring the supplies for this year's service, were to be attributed to the fatal counsel of the putting off the meeting of a parliament so long, and to the unnecessary delays of the house of commons. On the twenty-third of June, the articles of impeachment against Edward, earl of Orford, were read in Westminster-hall; but the house of commons having previously ordered that none of the members should appear at this pretended trial, those articles were not supported; so that his lordship was acquitted, and the impeachment dismissed: next day, the impeachments against the duke of Leeds, which had lain seven years neglected, together with those against the earl of Portland and lord Halifax, as well as the charge against lord Haversham, were dismissed for want of prosecution: each house ordered a narrative of these proceedings to be published; and their mutual animosity had proceeded to such a degree of rancor, as seemed to preclude all possibility of reconciliation: the commons, in the whole course of this transaction, had certainly acted from motives of faction and revenge; for nothing could be more unjust, frivolous, and partial than the charge exhibited in the articles of impeachment, their anticipating address to the king, and their affected delay in the prosecutions: their conduct on this occasion was so flagrant, as to attract the notice of the common people, and inspire the generality of the nation with disgust: this the whigs did not fail to augment by the arts of calumny, and in particular, by insinuating that the court of Versailles had found means to engage the majority of the commons in its interest.

54. This faction had, since the beginning of this session, employed their emissaries in exciting a popular aversion to the tory ministers and members; and succeeded so well in their endeavors, that they formed a scheme of obtaining petitions from different counties and corporations, that should induce the commons to alter their conduct, on the supposition that it was contrary to the sense of the nation: in execution of this scheme, a petition signed by the deputy-lieutenants, above twenty justices of the peace, the grand jury and freeholders of the county of Kent, had been presented to the house of commons on the eighteenth of May by five gentlemen of fortune and distinction: the purport of this remonstrance was to recommend union among themselves and confidence in his majesty, whose great actions for the nation could never be forgotten without the blackest ingratitude; to beg they would have regard to the voice of the people; that their religion and safety might be effectually provided for; that their loyal addresses might be turned into bills of supply; and that his most sacred majesty might be enabled powerfully to assist his allies before it should be too late. The house was so incensed at the petulance of the petition, that they voted it scandalous, insolent, and seditious; and ordered the gentlemen who had presented it to be taken into custody: they were afterwards committed to the Gate-house, where they remained till the prorogation of parliament; but they had no reason to repine at their imprisonment, which recommended them to the notice and esteem of the public: they were visited and caressed by the chiefs of the whig interest, and considered as martyrs to the liberties of the people: their confinement gave rise to a very extraordinary paper, entitled, 'a me-

memorial from the gentlemen, freeholders, and inhabitants of the counties of —, in behalf of themselves, and many thousands of the good people of England.' It was signed 'Legion,' and sent to the speaker in a letter, commanding him, in the name of 200,000 Englishmen, to deliver it to the house of commons: in this strange expostulation the house was charged with illegal and unwarrantable practices in fifteen particulars; a new claim of right was ranged under seven heads; and the commons were admonished to act according to their duty, as specified in this memorial, on pain of incurring the resentment of an injured nation: it was concluded in these words:—'for Englishmen are no more to be slaves to parliaments than to kings: our name is Legion, and we are many.' The commons were equally provoked and intimidated by this libel, which was the production of one Daniel de Foe, a scurrilous party-writer, in very little estimation: they would not, however, deign to take notice of it in the house; but a complaint being made of endeavors to raise tumults and seditions, a committee was appointed to draw up an address to his majesty, informing him of those seditious endeavors, and beseeching him to provide for the public peace and security.

55. The house, however, perceiving plainly that they had incurred the odium of the nation, which began to clamor for a war with France, and dreading the popular resentment, thought fit to change their measures with respect to this object, and present the address we have already mentioned, in which they promised to support him in the alliances he should contract with the emperor and other states, in order to bridle the exorbitant power of France: they likewise proceeded in earnest on the supply, and voted funds for raising about £2,700,000 to defray the expense of the ensuing year: they voted 30,000 seamen, and resolved that 10,000 troops should be transported from Ireland to Holland, as the auxiliaries stipulated in the treaty of 1677 with the States-General: the funds were constituted of a land-tax, certain duties on merchandise, and a weekly deduction from the excise, so as to bring down the civil list to £600,000, as the duke of Gloucester was dead, and James's queen refused her allowance: they passed a bill for taking away all privileges of parliament in legal prosecutions during the intermediate prorogations; their last struggle with the lords was concerning a bill for appointing commissioners to examine and state the public accounts: the persons nominated for this purpose were extremely obnoxious to the majority of the peers, as violent partisans of the tory faction : when the bill therefore was sent up to the lords, they made some amendments, which the commons rejected : the former animosity between the two houses began to revive, when the king interrupted their disputes, by putting an end to the session, on the twenty-fourth of June, after having thanked the parliament for their zeal in the public service, and exhorted them to a discharge of their duties in their several counties. He was, no doubt, extremely pleased with such an issue of a session that had begun with a very inauspicious aspect : his health daily declined ; but he concealed the decay of his constitution, that his allies might not be discouraged from engaging in a confederacy of which he was deemed the head and chief support : he conferred the command of the 10,000 troops destined for Holland on the earl of Marlborough, and appointed him at the same time his plenipotentiary to the States-General ;—a choice that evinced his discernment and discretion ; for that nobleman surpassed all his contemporaries both as a general and a politician : he was cool, penetrating, intrepid, and persevering ; plausible, insinuating, artful, and dissembling.

56. A regency being established, the king embarked for Holland in the beginning of July : on his arrival at the Hague he assisted at an assembly of the States-General, whom he harangued in very affectionate terms, and was answered with great cordiality : then he made a progress round the frontiers, to examine the state of the garrisons ; and gave such orders and directions as he judged necessary for the defence of the country : meanwhile, the French minister, D'Avaux, being recalled from the Hague, delivered a letter to the States from the French king, who complained that they had often interrupted the conferences, from which no good fruits were to be expected ; but he assured them it wholly depended on themselves, whether they should continue to receive marks of his ancient friendship for their republic : the letter was accompanied by an insolent memorial, to which the States-General returned a very spirited answer. As they expected nothing now but hostilities from France, they redoubled their diligence in making preparations for their own defence : they repaired their fortifications, augmented their army, and hired auxiliaries : king William and they had already engaged in an alliance with the king of Denmark, who undertook to sur-

nish a certain number of troops, in consideration of a subsidy; and they endeavored to mediate a peace between Sweden and Poland: but this they could not effect: France had likewise offered her mediation between those powers in hopes of bringing over Sweden to her interest; and the court of Vienna had tampered with the king of Poland; but he persisted in his resolution to prosecute the war. The Spaniards began to be very uneasy under the dominion of their new master: they were shocked at the insolence of his French ministers and attendants, and much more at the manners and fashions which they introduced: the *grande*s found themselves very little considered by their sovereign, and resented his economy; for he had endeavored to retrench the expense of the court, which had used to support their magnificence. Prince Eugene, at the head of the imperial army, had entered Italy by Vicenza, and passed the Adige near Carpi, where he defeated a body of 5000 French forces: the enemy were commanded by the duke of Savoy, assisted by marshal Catinat and the prince of Vaudemont, who did not think proper to hazard an engagement; but marshal Villeroy arriving in the latter end of August with orders to attack the imperialists, Catinat retired in disgust. The new general marched immediately towards Chiari, where prince Eugene was intrenched, and attacked his camp; but met with such a reception that he was obliged to retire with the loss of 5000 men: towards the end of the campaign the prince took possession of all the Mantuan territories, except Mantua itself, and Goito, the blockade of which he formed: he reduced all the places on the Oglio, and continued in the field during the whole winter, exhibiting repeated marks of the most invincible courage, indefatigable vigilance, and extensive capacity in the art of war: in January he had well nigh surprised Cremona, by introducing a body of men through an old aqueduct: they forced one of the gates, by which the prince and his followers entered: Villeroy, being wakened by the noise, ran out into the street, where he was taken; and the town must have been infallibly reduced, had prince Eugene been joined by another body of troops, which he had ordered to march from the Parmesan, and secure the bridge: these not arriving at the time appointed, an Irish regiment in the French service took possession of the bridge, and the prince was obliged to retire with his prisoner.

57. The French king, alarmed at the activity and military genius of the imperial general, sent a reinforcement to his army in Italy, and the duke of Vendome to command his forces in that country: he likewise importuned the duke of Savoy to assist him effectually; but that prince having obtained all he could expect from France, became cold and backward: his second daughter was by this time married to the new king of Spain, who met her at Barcelona, where he found himself involved in disputes with the states of Catalonia, who refused to pay a tax he had imposed until their privileges should be confirmed; and he was obliged to gratify them in this particular. The war continued to rage in the north: the young king of Sweden routed the Saxons on the river Danube: thence he marched into Courland, and took possession of Mittau without opposition; while the king of Poland retired into Lithuania. In Hungary the French emissaries endeavored to sow the seeds of a new revolt: they exerted themselves with indefatigable industry in almost every court of christendom: they had already gained over the elector of Bavaria, and his brother, the elector of Cologne, together with the dukes of Wolfenbottle and Saxe-Gotha, who professed neutrality; while they levied troops, and made such preparations for war, as plainly indicated that they had received subsidies from France: Louis had also extorted a treaty of alliance from the king of Portugal, who was personally attached to the Austrian interest; but this weak prince was a slave to his ministers, whom the French king had corrupted. During this summer, the French coasts were overawed by the combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of Sir George Rooke, who sailed down the channel in the latter end of August, and detached vice-admiral Benbow with a strong squadron to the West-Indies: in order to deceive the French king with regard to the destination of this fleet, king William demanded the free use of the Spanish harbors, as if his design had been to send a squadron to the Mediterranean; but he met with a repulse, while the French ships were freely admitted. About this period the king revoked his letters-patent to the commissioners of the admiralty, and constituted the earl of Pembroke lord high admiral of England, in order to avoid the factions, the disputes, and divided counsels of a board: the earl was no sooner promoted to this office, than he sent captain Loades with three frigates to Cadiz, to bring home the sea stores and effects belonging to the English in that place, before the war should commence; and this piece of service was successfully performed. The French king, in order to enjoy all the advantages that could be derived from his union with Spain, established a company, to open a trade with Mexico and Peru; and concluded a new Assiento treaty for supplying the Spanish plantations with negroes: at the same time, he sent a strong squadron to the port of Cadiz: the French dress was introduced into the court of Spain; and, by a formal edict, the grandees of that kingdom and the peers of France were put on a level in each nation. There was no vigor left in the councils of Spain: her finances were exhausted, and her former spirit seemed to be quite extinguished; the nobility were beggars, and the common people overwhelmed with indigence and distress: the condition of France was not much more prosperous: she had been harassed by a long war, and now saw herself on the eve of another, which in all probability would render her completely miserable.

58. These circumstances were well known to the emperor and the maritime powers, and served to animate their negotiations for another grand alliance: conferences were opened at the Hague; and, on the seventh of September, a treaty was concluded between his imperial majesty, England, and the States-General. The objects proposed, were to procure satisfaction to the emperor in the Spanish succession, and sufficient security for the dominions and commerce of the allies: they engaged to use their endeavors for recovering the Spanish Netherlands, as a barrier between Holland and France; and for putting the emperor in possession of the duchy of Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with the lands and islands on the coast of Tuscany belonging to the Spanish dominions: they agreed that the king of England and the States-General should keep and possess whatever lands and cities they should conquer from the Spaniards in the Indies; that the confederates should faithfully communicate their designs to one another; that no party should treat of peace or truce, but jointly with the rest; that they should concur in preventing the union of France and Spain under the same government, and hinder the French from possessing the Spanish Indies; that, in concluding a peace, the confederates should provide for the maintenance of the commerce carried on by the maritime powers to the dominions taken from the Spaniards, and secure the States by a barrier; that they should, at the same time, settle the exercise of religion in the new conquests; that they should assist one another with all their forces, in case of being invaded by the French king or any other potentate on account of this alliance; that a defensive alliance should remain between them, even after the peace; that all kings, princes, and states should be at liberty to engage in this alliance. They determined to employ two months to obtain by amicable means the satisfaction and security which they demanded, and stipulated that within six weeks the treaty should be ratified.

59. On the sixteenth of September, king James expired at St. Germain, after having labored under a tedious indisposition. This unfortunate monarch, since the miscarriage of his last attempt for recovering his throne, had laid aside all thoughts of worldly grandeur, and devoted his whole attention to the concerns of his soul: though he could not prevent the busy genius of his queen from planning new schemes of restoration, he was always best pleased when wholly detached from such chimerical projects: hunting was his chief diversion, but religion was his constant care: nothing could be more harmless than the life he led; and, in the course of it, he subjected himself to uncommon penance and mortification: he frequently visited the poor monks of La Trappe, who were much edified by his humble and pious deportment: his pride and arbitrary temper seem to have vanished with his greatness; he became affable, kind, and easy to all his dependents; and his religion certainly opened and improved the virtues of his heart, though it seemed to impair the faculties of his soul. In his last illness he conjured his son to prefer his religion to every worldly advantage, and even to renounce all thoughts of a crown if he could not enjoy it without offering violence to his faith: he recommended to him the practice of justice and christian forgiveness; he himself declaring, that he heartily forgave the prince of Orange, the emperor, and all his enemies. He died with great marks of devotion, and was interred, at his own request, in the church of the English Benedictines in Paris, without any funeral solemnity.

60. Before his death he was visited by the French king, who seemed touched with his condition, and declared, that in case of his death, he would own his son as king of England: this promise James's queen had already extorted from him, by the interest of Madame de Maintenon and the dauphin: accordingly, when James died, the pretended prince of Wales was proclaimed king of England at St.

Germain, and treated as such at the court of Versailles: his title was likewise recognised by the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the pope. William was no sooner informed of this transaction, than he despatched a courier to the king of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Ryswick, to complain of this manifest violation: at the same time, he recalled the earl of Manchester from Paris, and ordered him to return without taking an audience of leave: that nobleman immediately withdrew, after having intimated to the marquis de Torcy the order he had received. Louis, in vindication of his own conduct, dispersed through all the courts of Europe a manifesto, in which he affirmed that in owning the prince of Wales as king of England he had not infringed any article of the treaty of Ryswick: he confessed, that in the fourth article he had promised that he would not disturb the king of Great Britain in the peaceable possession of his dominions; and he declared his intention was to observe that promise punctually: he observed, that his generosity would not allow him to abandon the prince of Wales or his family; that he could not refuse him a title which was due to him by birth; that he had more reason to complain of the king of Great Britain and the States-General, whose declarations and preparations in favor of the emperor might be regarded as real contraventions to treaties: finally, he quoted some instances from history, in which the children enjoyed the titles of kingdoms which their fathers had lost: these reasons however would hardly have induced the French king to take such a step, had not he perceived that a war with England was inevitable, and that he should be able to reap some advantages in the course of it from espousing the cause of the pretender.

61. The substance of the French manifesto was published in London by Poussin, the secretary of Tallard, who had been left in England as agent for the court of Versailles: he was now ordered to leave the kingdom, which was filled with indignation at Louis for having pretended to declare who ought to be their sovereign: the city of London presented an address to the lords justices, expressing the deepest resentment of the French king's presumption; assured his majesty that they would at all times exert the utmost of their abilities for the preservation of his person, and the defence of his just rights, in opposition to all invaders of his crown and dignity: addresses of the same nature were sent up from all parts of the kingdom, and could not but be agreeable to William: he had now concerted measures for acting with vigor against France; and he resolved to revisit his kingdom, after having made a considerable progress in a treaty of perpetual alliance between England and the States-General, which was afterwards brought to perfection by his plenipotentiary, the earl of Marlborough: the king's return, however, was delayed a whole month by a severe indisposition, during which the Spanish minister De Quiros hired certain physicians to consult together on the state and nature of his distemper: they declared, that he could not live many weeks, and this opinion was transmitted to Madrid: William, however, baffled the prognostic, though his constitution had sustained such a rude shock, that he himself perceived his end was near: he told the earl of Portland he found himself so weak, that he could not expect to live another summer; but charged him to conceal this circumstance until he should be dead. Notwithstanding this near approach to dissolution, he exerted himself with surprising diligence and spirit in establishing the confederacy, and settling the plan of operations: a subsidiary treaty was concluded with the king of Prussia, who engaged to furnish a certain number of troops: the emperor agreed to maintain 90,000 men in the field against France; the proportion of the States was limited to 102,000; and that of England did not exceed 40,000, to act in conjunction with the allies.

62. On the fourth of November the king arrived in England, which he found in a strange ferment, produced from the mutual animosity of the two factions: they reviled each other in words and writing with all the falsehood of calumny, and all the bitterness of rancor; so that truth, candor, and temperance seemed to be banished by consent of both parties. The king had found himself deceived in his new ministers, who had opposed his measures with all their influence: he was particularly disgusted with the deportment of the earl of Rochester, who proved altogether imperious and untractable; and, instead of moderating, inflamed the violence of his party: the king declared, the year in which that nobleman directed his councils was the uneasiest of his whole life: he could not help expressing his displeasure in such a coldness of reserve, that Rochester told him he would serve his majesty no longer, since he did not enjoy his confidence: William made no answer to this expostulation, but resolved he should see him no more: the earl, however, at the desire of Mr. Harley, became more pliant and submissive; and, after the king's departure for Holland, repaired to his government of Ireland, in which he now remained, exerting all his endeavors to acquire popularity. William, foreseeing nothing but opposition from the present spirit of the house of commons, closeted some of their leaders, with a view to bespeak their compliance; but finding them determined to pursue their former principles, and to insist on their impeachments, he resolved, with the advice of his friends, to dissolve the parliament: this step he was the more easily induced to take, as the commons were become extremely odious to the nation in general, which breathed nothing but war and defiance against the French monarch: the parliament was accordingly dissolved by proclamation, and another summoned to meet on the thirtieth of December.

63. Never did the two parties proceed with such heat and violence against each other, as in their endeavors to influence the new elections: the whigs however obtained the victory, as they included the moneyed-interest, which will always prevail among the borough-electors: corruption was now reduced into an open and avowed commerce; and, had not the people been so universally venal and profligate that no sense of shame remained, the victors must have blushed for their success. Though the majority thus obtained was stanch to the measures of the court, the choice of speaker fell on Mr. Harley, contrary to the inclination of the king, who favored Sir Thomas Lyttleton; but his majesty's speech was received with universal applause: it was so much admired by the well-wishers to the revolution, that they printed it with decorations, in the English, Dutch, and French languages: it appeared as a piece of furniture in all their houses, and as the king's last legacy to his own and all protestant people. In this celebrated harangue, he expatiated on the indignity offered to the nation by the French king's acknowledging the pretended prince of Wales: he explained the dangers to which it was exposed by his placing his grandson on the throne of Spain: he gave them to understand he had concluded several alliances, according to the encouragement given him by both houses of parliament, which alliances should be laid before them, together with other treaties still depending: he observed, that the eyes of all Europe were on this parliament, and all matters at a stand until their resolution should be known; therefore, no time ought to be lost : he told them, they had yet an opportunity to secure for themselves and their posterity the quiet enjoyment of their religion and liberties, if they were not wanting to themselves, but would exert the ancient vigor of the English nation ; but he declared his opinion was, that should they neglect this occasion, they had no reason to hope for another : he said, it would be necessary to maintain a great strength at sea, and a force on land proportionable to that of their allies : he pressed the commons to support the public credit, which could not be preserved without keeping sacred that maxim, that they shall never be losers who trust to parliamentary security : he declared that he never asked aids from his people without regret ; that what he desired was for their own safety and honor, at such a critical time ; and that the whole should be appropriated to the purposes for which it was intended : he expressed his willingness that the accounts should be yearly submitted to the inspection of parliament : he again recommended despatch, together with good bills for employing the poor, encouraging trade, and suppressing vice : he expressed his hope that they were come together, determined to avoid disputes and differences, and to act with a hearty concurrence for promoting the common cause : he said, he should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if they were as much inclined to lay aside those unhappy fatal animosities which divided and weakened them, as he was disposed to make all his subjects safe and easy, as to any, even the highest offences committed against his person : he conjured them to disappoint the hopes of their enemies by their unanimity : as he had always shown, and always would show, how desirous he was to be the common father of all his people, he desired they would lay aside parties and divisions, so as that no distinction should be heard of amongst them, but of those who were friends to the protestant religion and present establishment, and of those who wished for a popish prince and a French government : he concluded by affirming, that if they in good earnest desired to see England hold the balance of Europe, and be indeed at the head of the protestant interest, it would appear by their improving the present opportunity. The lords immediately drew up a warm and affectionate address, in which they expressed their resentment of the proceedings of the French king, in owning the pretended prince of Wales for king of England : they assured his majesty, they would assist him to the utmost of their power against all his enemies; and when it should please God to deprive them of his majesty's protection, they would vigorously assist and defend against the pretended prince of Wales, and all other pretenders whatsoever, every person and persons who had right to succeed to the crown of England, by virtue of the acts of parliament for establishing and limiting the succession: on the fifth of January, 1702, an address to the same effect was presented by the commons, and both met with a very gracious reception from his majesty. The lords, as a farther proof of their zeal, having taken into consideration the dangers that threatened Europe from the accession of the duke of Anjou to the crown of Spain, drew up another address, explaining their sense of that danger; stigmatising the French king as a violator of treaties; declaring their opinion, that his majesty, his subjects, and allies could never be safe and secure until the house of Austria should be restored to their rights, and the invader of the Spanish monarchy brought to reason; and assuring his majesty that no time should be lost, nor any thing wanting on their parts, which might answer the reasonable expectations of their friends abroad; not doubting but to support the reputation of the English name, when engaged under so great a prince, in the glorious cause of maintaining the liberty of Europe.

64. The king, in order to acquire the confidence of the commons, ordered Mr. secretary Vernon to lay before them copies of the treaties and conventions he had lately concluded, which were so well approved, that the house unanimously voted the supply: by another vote, they authorised the exchequer to borrow £600,000 at six per cent. for the service of the fleet, and £50,000 for the subsistence of guards and garrisons: they deliberated on the state of the navy, with the debt due on it, and examined an estimate of what would be necessary for extraordinary repairs: they called for an account of that part of the national debt for which no provision had been made: they ordered the speaker to write to the trustees for the forfeited estates in Ireland, to attend the house with a full detail of their proceedings in the execution of that act of parliament. On the ninth of January, they unanimously resolved that leave be given to bring in a bill for securing his majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the protestant line, for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales, and all other pretenders, and their open and secret abettors: they resolved to address his majesty, that he would insert an article in all his treaties of alliance, importing that no peace should be made with France, until his majesty and the nation have reparation for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland: they agreed to maintain 40,000 men for the sea service, and a like number by land, to act in conjunction with the forces of the allies, according to the proportions settled by the contracting powers: the supplies were raised by an imposition of four shillings in the pound on lands, annuities, pensions, and stipends, and on the profits arising from the different professions; by a tax of two and one-half per cent, on all stock in trade, and money at interest; of five shillings in the pound on all salaries, fees, and perquisites; a capitation tax of four shillings; an imposition of one per cent. on all shares in the capital stock of any corporation or company which should be bought, sold, or bargained for; a duty of sixpence per bushel on malt, and a farther duty on mum, cider, and perry.

65. The commons seemed to vie with the lords in their zeal for the government: they brought in a bill for attainting the pretended prince of Wales, which being sent up to the other house, passed with an additional clause of attainder against the queen, who acted as regent for the pretender: this, however, was not carried without great opposition in the house of lords: when the bill was sent back to the commons, they excepted to the amendment as irregular: they observed, that attainders by bill constituted the most rigorous part of the law, and that the stretching of it ought to be avoided: they proposed, that the queen should be attainted by a separate bill: the lords assented to the proposal; and the bill against the pretended prince of Wales passed: the lords passed another for attainting the queen: however, it was neglected in the house of commons: but the longest and warmest debates of this session were produced by a bill, which the lords brought in, for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, and swearing to the king by the title of rightful and lawful king, and his heirs, according to the act of settlement: it was proposed that this oath should be voluntary, tendered to all persons, and their subscription or refusal recorded without any other penalty. This article was violently opposed by the earl of Nottingham, and other lords of the tory interest: they observed, that the government was first settled with another oath, which was like an original contract; so that there was no occasion for a new imposition: that oaths relating to men's opinions had been always considered as severe impositions; and that a voluntary oath was in its own nature unlawful. During these disputes, another bill of abjuration was brought into the house of commons by Sir Charles Hedges, that should be obligatory on all persons who enjoyed employments in church or state; it likewise included an obligation to maintain the government in king, lords, and commons, and to maintain the church of England, together with the toleration for dissenters: warm debates arose on the question, whether the oath should be imposed or voluntary; and at length it was carried for imposition by the majority of one voice: they agreed to insert an additional clause, declaring it equally penal to compass or imagine the death of her royal highness the princess Anne of Denmark, as it was to compass or imagine the death of the king's eldest son and heir: in the house of peers this bill was strenuously opposed by the tories; and, when after long debates it passed on the twenty-fourth of February, ten lords entered a protest against it, as an unnecessary and severe imposition.

66. The whole nation now seemed to join in the cry for a war with France: party heats began to abate; the factions in the city of London were in a great measure moderated by the union of the two companies trading to the East-Indies, which found their mutual interest required a coalition: the tories in the house of commons, having concurred so heartily with the inclinations of the people, resolved, as far as it lay in their power, to justify the conduct of their party in the preceding parliament: they complained of some petitions and addresses which had reflected on the proceedings of the last house of commons, and particularly of the Kentish petition: the majority, however, determined, that it was the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or address the king for the calling, sitting, or dissolving of parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances; and that every subject under any accusation, either by impeachment or otherwise, had a right to be brought to a speedy trial: a complaint being likewise made, that the lords had denied the commons justice in the matter of the late impeachments, a furious debate ensued; and it was carried by a very small majority that justice had not been denied : in some points, however, they succeeded : in the case of a controverted election at Maidstone, between Thomas Blisse and Thomas Culpepper, the house resolved, that the latter had been not only guilty of corrupt, scandalous, and indirect practices, in endeavoring to procure himself to be elected a burgess ; but likewise, being one of the instruments in promoting and presenting the scandalous, insolent, and seditious petition, commonly called the Kentish petition, to the last house of commons, was guilty of promoting a scandalous, villanous, and groundless reflection on that house, by aspersing the members with receiving French money, or being in the interest of France ; for which offence he was ordered to be committed to Newgate, and to be prosecuted by his majesty's attorney-general : they also resolved, that to assert that the house of commons is not the only representative of the commons of England, tends to the subversion of the rights and privileges of the house of commons, and the fundamental constitution of the government of this kingdom : that to assert that the house of commons have no power of commitment, but of their own members, tends to the subversion of the constitution of the house of commons that to print or publish any books or libels, reflecting on the proceedings of the house of commons, or any member thereof, for or relating to his service therein, is a high violation of the rights and privileges of the house of commons. Notwithstanding these transactions, they did not neglect the vigorous prosecution of the war : they addressed his majesty to interpose with his allies, that they might increase their quotas of land forces, to be put on board the fleet in proportion to the numbers his majesty should embark : when they had settled the sums appropriated to the several uses of the war, they presented a second address, desiring he would provide for the half-pay officers, in the first place, in the recruits and levies to be made : the king assured them it was always his intention to provide for those officers : he went to the house of peers, and gave the royal assent to an act, appointing commissioners to take, examine, and determine the debts due to the army, navy, and the transport-service ; and also to take an account of prizes taken during the war.

67. The affairs of Ireland were not a little embarrassed by the conduct of the trustees appointed to take cognisance of the forfeited estates : their office was extremely odious to the people as well as to the court, and their deportment was arbitrary and imperious: several individuals of that kingdom, provoked by the insolence of the trustees on one hand, and encouraged by the countenance of the courtiers on the other, endeavored, by a circular letter, to spirit up the grand jury of Ireland against the act of resumption: petitions were presented to the king, couched in very strong terms, affirming that it was injurious to the protestant interest, and had been obtained by gross misinformations: the king having communicated these addresses to the house, they were immediately voted scandalous, false, and groundless; and the commons resolved, that notwithstanding the complaints and clamors against the trustees, it did not appear to the house but those complaints were groundless: nevertheless they afterwards received several petitions, imploring relief against the said act; and they ordered that the petitioners should be relieved accordingly: proposals were delivered in for incorporating such as should purchase the said forfeitures, on certain terms therein specified, according to the rent-roll, when verified and made good to the purchasers; but, whereas in this rent-roll the value of the estates had been esteemed at something more than £716,000, those who undertook to make the purchase affirmed they were not worth £500,000; and thus the affair remained in suspense.

68. With respect to Scotland, the clamors of that kingdom had not yet subsided. When the bill of abjuration passed in the house of peers, the earl of Nottingham had declared, that although he differed in opinion from the majority in many particulars relating to that bill, yet he was a friend to the design of it; and in order to secure a protestant succession, he thought a union of the whole island was absolutely necessary: he therefore moved for an address to the king, that he would dissolve the parliament of Scotland now sitting, as the legality of it might be called in question, on account of its having been originally a convention; and that a new parliament should be summoned, that they might treat about a union of the two kingdoms. The king had this affair so much at heart, that even when he was disabled from going to the parliament in person, he sent a letter to the commons, expressing an eager desire that a treaty for this purpose might be set on foot, and earnestly recommending this affair to the consideration of the house; but as a new parliament in Scotland could not be called without a great risk while the nation was in such a ferment, the project was postponed to a more favorable opportunity.

69. Before the king's return from Holland he had concerted with his allies the operations of the ensuing campaign: he had engaged in a negotiation with the prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, who assured him, that if he would besiege and take Cadiz, the admiral of Castile and divers other grandees of Spain would declare for the house of Austria: the allies had also determined on the siege of Keiserswaert, which the elector of Cologne had delivered into the hands of the French; the elector of Hanover had resolved to disarm the princes of Wolfenbuttle; the king of the Romans and prince Louis of Baden undertook to invest Landau; and the emperor promised to send a powerful reinforcement to prince Eugene in Italy; but William did not live to see these schemes put in execution: his constitution was by this time almost exhausted, though he endeavored to conceal the effects of his malady, and to repair his health by exercise. On the twenty-first of February, in riding to Hampton-court from Kensington, his horse fell under him, and he himself was thrown on the ground with such violence, as produced a fracture in his collar-bone: his attendants conveyed him to the palace of Hampton-court, where the fracture was reduced by Ronjat, his sergeant-surgeon: in the evening he returned to Kensington in his coach; and the two ends of the fractured bone having been disunited by the jolting of the carriage, were replaced under the inspection of Bidloo, his physician: he seemed to be in a fair way of recovering till the first of March, when his knee appeared to be inflamed, with great pain and weakness: next day he granted a commission under the great seal to several peers for passing the bills to which both houses of parliament had agreed; namely, the act of attainder against the pretended prince of Wales, and another in favor of the quakers, enacting that their solemn affirmation and declaration should be accepted instead of an oath in the usual form.

70. On the fourth of March the king was so well recovered of his lameness, that he took several turns in the gallery at Kensington; but, sitting down on a couch where he fell asleep, he was seized with a shivering, which terminated in a fever and diarrhœa: he was attended by Sir Thomas Millington, Sir Richard Blackmore, Sir Theodore Colledon, Dr. Bidloo, and other eminent physicians; but their prescriptions proved ineffectual: on the sixth he granted another commission for passing the bill for the malt-tax, and the act of abjuration; and, being so weak that he could not write his name, he, in presence of the lord-keeper and the clerks of parliament, applied a stamp prepared for the purpose. The earl of Albemarle, arriving from Holland, conferred with him in private on the posture of affairs abroad; but he received his informations with great coldness, and said, Je tire vers ma fin;—‘I approach the end of my life.’ In the evening he thanked Dr. Bidloo for his care and tenderness, saying, ‘I know that you and the other learned physicians have done all that your art can do for my relief; but, finding all means ineffectual, I submit.’ He received spiritual consolation from archbishop Tennison, and Burnet, bishop of Salisbury: on Sunday morning the sacrament was administered to him: the lords of the privy-council, and divers noblemen attended in the adjoining apartments, and to some of them who were admitted he spoke a little: he thanked lord Auverquerque for his long and faithful services: he delivered to lord Albemarle the keys of his closet and scrutoire, telling him he knew what to do with them: he inquired for the earl of Portland; but, being speechless before that nobleman arrived, he grasped his hand, and laid it to his heart, with marks of the most tender affection. On the eighth of March, he expired, in the fifty-second year of his age, after having reigned thirteen years: the lords Lexington and Scarborough, who were in waiting, no sooner perceived the king was dead, than they ordered Ronjat to untie from his left arm a black ribbon, to which was affixed a ring, containing some hair of the late queen Mary: the body, being opened and embalmed, lay in state for some time at Kensington; and on the twelfth of April was deposited in a vault of Henry’s chapel in Westminster-abbey. In the beginning of May, a will which he had entrusted with Monsieur Schuylemburg was opened at the Hague: in this he had declared his cousin prince Frison of Nassau, stadtholder of Friesland, his sole and universal heir, and appointed the States-General his executors: by a codicil annexed, he had bequeathed the lordship of Breevert and a legacy of 200,000 guilders to the earl of Albemarle.

71. William III. was in his person of the middle stature, a thin body, a delicate constitution, subject to an asthma and continual cough from his infancy: he had an aquiline nose, sparkling eyes, a large forehead, and a grave solemn aspect: he was very sparing of speech; his conversation was dry, and his manner disgusting, except in battle, when his deportment was free, spirited, and animating: in courage, fortitude, and equanimity he rivalled the most eminent warriors of antiquity; and his natural sagacity made amends for the defects in his education, which had not been properly superintended: he was religious, temperate, generally just and sincere, a stranger to violent transports of passion, and might have passed for one of the best princes of the age in which he lived, had he never ascended the throne of Great Britain: but the distinguishing criterion of his character was ambition: to this he sacrificed the punctilios of honor and decorum, in deposing his own father-in-law and uncle; and this he gratified at the expense of the nation that raised him to sovereign authority: he aspired to the honor of acting as umpire in all the contests of Europe: and the second object of his attention was, the prosperity of that country to which he owed his birth and extraction. Whether he really thought the interests of the continent and Great Britain were inseparable, or sought only to drag England into the confederacy as a convenient ally; certain it is, he involved these kingdoms in foreign connexions, which in all probability will be productive of their ruin: in order to establish this favorite point, he scrupled not to employ all the engines of corruption, by which the morals of the nation were totally debauched: he procured a parliamentary sanction for a standing army, which now seems to be interwoven in the constitution: he introduced the pernicious practice of borrowing on remote funds; an expedient that necessarily hatched a brood of usurers, brokers, contractors, and stock-jobbers, to prey on the vitals of their country: he entailed on the nation a growing debt, and a system of politics big with misery, despair, and destruction. To sum up his character in a few words; William was a fatalist in religion, indefatigable in war, enterprising in politics, dead to all the warm and generous emotions of the human heart, a cold relation, an indifferent husband, a disagreeable man, an ungracious prince, and an imperious sovereign.<sup>13</sup>

1. WILLIAM was succeeded as sovereign of England by Anne, princess of Denmark, who ascended the throne in the

thirty-eighth year of her age, to the general satisfaction of all parties: even the Jacobites seemed pleased with her elevation, on the supposition, that as in all probability she would leave no heirs of her own body, the dictates of natural affection would induce her to alter the succession in favor of her own brother: she had been taught to cherish warm sentiments of the tories, whom she considered as the friends of monarchy, and the true sons of the church, and they had always professed an inviolable attachment to her person and interest; but her conduct was wholly influenced by the countess of Marlborough, a woman of an imperious temper and intriguing genius, who had been intimate with the princess from her tender years, and gained a surprising ascendancy over her. Anne had undergone some strange vicissitudes of fortune in consequence of her father's expulsion, and sustained a variety of mortifications in the late reign, during which she conducted herself with such discretion, as left little or no pretence for censure or resentment: such conduct, indeed, was in a great measure owing to a natural temperance of disposition, not easily ruffled or inflamed: she was zealously devoted to the church of England, from which her father had used some endeavors to detach her before the revolution; and she lived in great harmony with her husband, to whom she bore six children, all of whom she had already survived. William had no sooner yielded up his breath, than the privy-council in a body waited on the new queen, who in a short but sensible speech assured them that no pains nor diligence should be wanting on her part to preserve and support the religion, laws, and liberties of her country, to maintain the succession in the protestant line, and the government in church and state as by law established: she declared her resolution to carry on the preparations for opposing the exorbitant power of France, and to assure the allies that she would pursue the true interest of England, together with theirs, for the support of the common cause. The members of the privy-council having taken the oaths, she ordered a proclamation to be published, signifying her pleasure, that all persons in office of authority or government at the decease of the late king, should so continue till farther directions: by virtue of an act passed in the late reign, the parliament continued sitting even after the king's death: both houses met immediately, and unanimously voted an address of condolence and congratulation; and in the afternoon the queen was proclaimed: next day the lords and commons severally attended her with an address, congratulating her majesty's accession to the throne, and assuring her of their firm resolution to support her against all her enemies whatsoever. The lords acknowledged, that their great loss was no otherwise to be repaired but by a vigorous adherence to her majesty and her allies, in the prosecution of those measures already concerted to reduce the exorbitant power of France: the commons declared, they would maintain the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and effectually provide for the public credit of the nation. These addresses were graciously received by the queen, who, on the eleventh of March went to the house of peers with the usual solemnity, where, in a speech to both houses, she expressed her satisfaction at their unanimous concurrence with her opinion, that too much could not be done for the encouragement of their allies in humbling the power of France; and desired they would consider of proper methods towards obtaining a union between England and Scotland: she observed to the commons, that the revenue for defraying the expenses of the civil government was expired; and that she relied intirely on their affection for its being supplied in such a manner as should be most suitable to the honor and dignity of the crown: she declared it should be her constant endeavor to make them the best return for their duty and affection, by a careful and diligent administration for the good of all her subjects: 'and as I know my own heart to be intirely English,' continued she, 'I can very sincerely assure you, there is not any thing you can expect or desire from me, which I shall not be ready to do for the happiness and prosperity of England; and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word.' These assurances were extremely agreeable to the parliament, and she received the thanks of both houses: addresses of congratulation were presented by the bishop and clergy of London; by the dissenters in and about that city; and by all the counties, cities, towns, and corporations of England: she declared her attachment to the church; she promised her protection to the dissenters; and received the compliments of all her subjects with such affability as ensured their affection.

2. William's death was no sooner known at the Hague, than all Holland was filled with consternation: the States immediately assembled, and for some time gazed at each other in silent fear and astonishment: they sighed, wept, and interchanged embraces and vows that they would act with unanimity, and expend their dearest blood in defence of their country: then they despatched letters to the cities and provinces, informing them of this unfortunate event, and exhorting them to union and perseverance. The express from England having brought the queen's speech to her privy-council, it was translated and published, to revive the drooping spirits of the people: next day pensionary Fagel imparted to the States of Holland a letter which he had received from the earl of Marlborough, containing assurances, in the queen's name, of union and assistance: in a few days, the queen wrote a letter in the French language to the States, confirming these assurances: it was delivered by Mr. Stanhope, whom she had furnished with fresh credentials as envoy from England: thus animated, the States resolved to prosecute vigorous measures: their resolutions were still more inspirited by the arrival of the earl of Marlborough, whom the queen honored with the order of the garter, and invested with the character of ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States-General: he was likewise declared captain-general of her forces both at home and abroad. He assured the States, that her Britannic majesty would maintain the alliances which had been concluded by the late king, and do every thing that the common concerns of Europe required: the speech was answered by Dyckvelt, president of the week, who, in the name of the States, expressed their hearty thanks to her majesty, and their resolutions of concurring with her in a vigorous prosecution of the common interest.

3. The importance of William's life was evinced by the joy that diffused itself through the kingdom of France at the news of his decease: the person who first brought the tidings to Calais was imprisoned by the governor until his information was confirmed: the court of Versailles could hardly restrain their transports so as to preserve common decorum; the people of Paris openly rejoiced at the event; all decency was laid aside at Rome, where this incident produced such indecent raptures, that cardinal Grimani, the imperial minister, complained of them to the pope, as an insult on his master the emperor, who was William's friend, confederate, and ally. The French king despatched credentials to Barre, whom the count D'Avaux had left at the Hague to manage the affairs of France, together with instructions to renew the negociation with the States, in hope of detaching them from the alliance: this minister presented a memorial implying severe reflections on king William, and the past conduct of the Dutch; and insinuating, that now they had recovered their liberty, the court of France hoped they would consult their true interest. The count de Goes, envoy from the emperor, animadverted on these expressions in another memorial, which was likewise published: the States produced in public an answer to the same remonstrance, expressing their resentment at the insolence of such insinuations, and their veneration for the memory of their late stadtholder. The earl of Marlborough succeeded in every part of his negotiation: he animated the Dutch to a full exertion of their vigor; he concerted the operations of the campaign; he agreed with the States-General and the imperial minister, that war should be declared against France on the same day, at Vienna, London, and the Hague; and on the third of April embarked for England, after having acquired the intire confidence of those who governed the United Provinces.

4. By this time the house of commons in England had settled the civil list on the queen for her life: when the bill received the royal assent, she assured them, that £100,000 of this revenue should be applied to the public service of the current year: at the same time she passed another bill, for receiving and examining the public accounts: a commission for this purpose was granted in the preceding reign, but had been some years discontinued; and, indeed, always proved ineffectual to detect and punish those individuals who shamefully pillaged their country: the villany was so complicated, the vice so general, and the delinquents so powerfully screened by artifice and interest, as to elude all inquiry. On the twenty-fourth of March the oath of abjuration was taken by the speaker and members, according to an act for the farther security of her majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales. The queen's inclination to the tories plainly appeared in her choice of ministers: doctor John Sharp, archbishop of York, became her ghostly director and counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs; the earl of Rochester was continued lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and enjoyed a great share of her majesty's confidence; the privy-seal was entrusted to the marquis of Normanby; the earl of Nottingham and Sir Charles Hedges were appointed secretaries of state; the earl of Abingdon, viscount Weymouth, lord Dartmouth, Sir

Christopher Musgrave, Grenville, Howe, Gower, and Harcourt were admitted as members of the privy-council, together with Sir Edward Seymour, now declared comptroller of the household: the lord Godolphin declined accepting the office of lord high-treasurer, until he was over-ruled by the persuasions of Marlborough, to whose eldest daughter his son was married: this nobleman refused to command the forces abroad, unless the treasury should be put into the hands of Godolphin, on whose punctuality in point of remittances he knew he could depend; George, prince of Denmark, was invested with the title of generalissimo of all the queen's forces by sea and land; and afterwards created lord high-admiral, the earl of Pembroke having been dismissed from this office with the offer of a large pension, which he generously refused: prince George, as admiral, was assisted by a council, consisting of Sir George Rooke, Sir David Mitchell, George Churchill, and Richard Hill: though the legality of this board was doubted, the parliament had such respect and veneration for the queen, that it was suffered to act without question.

5. A rivalry for the queen's favor already appeared between the earls of Rochester and Marlborough: the former, as first cousin to the queen, and chief of the tory faction, maintained considerable influence in the council; but even there the interest of his rival predominated: Marlborough was not only the better courtier, but, by the canal of his countess, actually directed the queen in all her resolutions. Rochester proposed in council, that the English should avoid a declaration of war with France, and act as auxiliaries only: he was seconded by some other members; but the opinion of Marlborough preponderated: he observed, that the honor of the nation was concerned to fulfil the late king's engagements; and affirmed that France could never be reduced within due bounds unless the English would enter as principals in the quarrel: this allegation was supported by the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, the earl of Pembroke, and the majority of the council. The queen being resolved to declare war, communicated her intention to the house of commons, by whom it was approved; and on the fourth of May the declaration was solemnly proclaimed. The king of France was, in this proclamation, taxed with having taken possession of great part of the Spanish dominions; with designing to invade the liberties of Europe, and obstruct the freedom of navigation and commerce; with having offered an unpardonable insult to the queen and her throne, by taking on him to declare the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The three declarations of the emperor, England, and the States-General, which were published in one day, did not fail to disconcert as well as to provoke the French monarch: when his minister De Torcy recited them in his hearing, he spoke of the queen with some acrimony; but with respect to the States-General, he declared, with great emotion, that 'Messieurs the Dutch merchants should one day repent of their insolence and presumption, in declaring war against so powerful a monarch:' he did not however produce his declaration till the third of July.

6. The house of commons, in compliance with the queen's desire, brought in a bill, empowering her majesty to name commissioners to treat with the Scots for a union of the two kingdoms: it met with warm opposition from Sir Edward Seymour, and other tory members, who discharged abundance of satire and ridicule on the Scottish nation: but the measure seemed so necessary at that juncture, to secure the protestant succession against the practices of France and the claims of the pretender, that the majority espoused the bill, which passed through both houses, and on the sixth of May received the royal assent, together with some bills of less importance. The enemies of the late king continued to revile his memory:<sup>14</sup> they even charged him with having formed a design of excluding the princess Anne from the throne, and of introducing the elector of Hanover as his own immediate successor: this report had been so industriously circulated, that it began to gain credit all over the kingdom: several peers interested themselves in William's character; and a motion was made in the upper house, that the truth of this report should be inquired into. The house immediately desired that those lords who had visited the late king's papers would intimate whether or not they had found any among them relating to the queen's succession, or to the succession of the house of Hanover: they forthwith declared, that nothing of that sort appeared: then the house resolved, that the report was groundless, false, villanous, and scandalous; to the dishonor of the late king's memory, and highly tending to the disservice of her present majesty, whom they besought to give order that the authors or publishers of such scandalous reports should be prosecuted by the attorney-general: the same censure was passed on some libels and pamphlets, tending to inflame the factions of the kingdom, and to propagate a spirit of irreligion.<sup>15</sup> On the twenty-first of May, the commons, in an address, advised her majesty to engage the emperor, the States-General, and her other allies to join with her in prohibiting all intercourse with France and Spain; and to concert such methods with the States-General as might most effectually secure the trade of her subjects and allies: the lords presented another address, desiring the queen would encourage her subjects to equip privateers; as the preparations of the enemy seemed to be made for a piratical war, to the interruption of commerce: they likewise exhorted her majesty to grant commissions or charters to all persons who should make such acquisitions in the Indies, as she in her great wisdom should judge most expedient for the good of her kingdoms. On the twenty-fifth of May, the queen, having passed several public and private bills,<sup>16</sup> dismissed the parliament by prorogation, after having, in a short speech, thanked them for their zeal, recommended unanimity, and declared she would carefully preserve and maintain the act of toleration.

7. In Scotland a warm contest arose between the revolutioners and those in the opposition, concerning the existence of the present parliament. The queen had signified her accession to the throne in a letter to her privy-council

<sup>16</sup> During this short session, the queen gave her assent to an act for laying a duty on land; to another for encouraging the Greenland trade; to a third for making good the deficiencies and the public credit; to a fourth for continuing the imprisonment of Counter and other conspirators against king William; to a fifth for the relief of protestant purchasers of the forfeited estates of Ireland; to a sixth enlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration; to a seventh obliging the Jews to maintain and provide for their protestant children.

for Scotland, desiring they would continue to act in that office until she should send a new commission : meanwhile, she authorised them to publish a proclamation, ordaining all officers of state, counsellors, and magistrates to act in all things conformably to the commissions and instructions of his late majesty, until new commissions should be prepared : she likewise assured them of her firm resolution to protect them in their religion, laws, and liberties, and in the established government of the church : she had already, in presence of twelve Scottish counsellors, taken the coronation-oath for that kingdom ; but those who wanted to embroil the affairs of their country affirmed that this was an irregular way of proceeding, and that the oath ought to have been tendered by persons deputed for that purpose, either by the parliament or the privy-council of the kingdom. The present ministry, consisting of the duke of Queensbury, the earls of Marchmont, Melvil, Seafield, Hyndford, and Selkirk, were devoted to revolution principles, and desirous that the parliament should continue, in pursuance of a late act for continuing the parliament that should be then in being, six months after the death of the king ; and that it should assemble in twenty days after that event. The queen had, by several adjournments, deferred the meeting almost three months after the king's decease ; and therefore the anti-revolutioners affirmed that it was dissolved : the duke of Hamilton was at the head of this party, which clamored loudly for a new parliament : this nobleman, together with the marquis of Tweeddale, the earls Marshal and Rothes, and many other noblemen, repaired to London, in order to make the queen acquainted with their objections to the continuance of the present parliament : she admitted them to her presence, and calmly heard their allegations : but she was determined by the advice of her privy-council for that kingdom, who were of opinion that the nation was in too great a ferment to hazard the convocation of a new parliament. According to the queen's last adjournment, the parliament met at Edinburgh on the ninth of June, the duke of Queensbury having been appointed high-commissioner : before the queen's commission was read, the duke of Hamilton, for himself and his adherents, declared their satisfaction at her majesty's accession to the throne, not only on account of her undoubted right by descent, but likewise because of her many personal virtues and royal qualities : he said they were resolved to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of her majesty's right against all her enemies whatever ; but, at the same time, they thought themselves bound in duty to give their opinion, that they were not warranted by law to sit and act as a parliament: he then read a paper to the following effect: that forasmuch as, by the fundamental laws and constitution of this kingdom, all parliaments do dissolve on the death of their sovereign, except in so far as innovated by an act in the preceding reign, that the parliament in being at his majesty's decease should meet, and act what might be needful for the defence of the true protestant religion, as by law established, and for the maintenance of the succession to the crown, as settled by the claim of right, and for the preservation and security of the public peace: and seeing these ends are fully answered by her majesty's succession to the throne, we conceive ourselves not now warranted by law to meet, sit, or act; and therefore do dissent from any thing that shall be done or acted. The duke, having recited this paper, and formally protested against the proceedings of the parliament, withdrew with seventy-nine members amidst the acclamations of the people.

8. Notwithstanding their secession, the commissioner, who retained a much greater number, produced the queen's letter, signifying her resolution to maintain and protect her subjects in the full possession of their religion, laws, liberties, and the presbyterian discipline: she informed them of her having declared war against France; she exhorted them to provide competent supplies for maintaining such a number of forces as might be necessary for disappointing the enemy's designs, and preserving the present happy settlement; and she earnestly recommended to their consideration a union of the two kingdoms. The duke of Queensbury and the earl of Marchmont having enforced the different articles of this letter, committees were appointed for the security of the kingdom, for controverted elections, for drawing up an answer to her majesty's letter, and for revising the minutes: meanwhile, the duke of Hamilton and his adherents sent the lord Blantyre to London, with an address to the queen, who refused to receive it, but wrote another letter to the parliament, expressing her resolution to maintain their dignity and authority against all opposers. They, in answer to the former, had assured her, that the groundless secession of some members should increase and strengthen their care and zeal for her majesty's service: they expelled Sir Alexander Bruce for having given vent to some reflections against presbytery: the lord advocate prosecuted the faculty of advocates before the parliament for having passed a vote among themselves in favor of the protestation and address of the dissenting members: the faculty was severely reprimanded; but the whole nation seemed to resent the prosecution. The parliament passed an act for recognising her majesty's royal authority; another for adjourning the court of judicature called the session; a third declaring this meeting of parliament legal, and forbidding any person to disown, quarrel with, or impugn the dignity and authority thereof, under the penalty of high treason; a fourth for securing the true protestant religion and presbyterian church government; a fifth for a land-tax; and a sixth enabling her majesty to appoint commissioners for a union between the two kingdoms.

9. The earl of Marchmont, of his own accord, and even contrary to the advice of the high-commissioner, brought in a bill for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales; but this was not supported by the court party, as the commissioner had no instructions how to act on the occasion: perhaps the queen and her English ministry resolved to keep the succession open in Scotland, as a check on the whigs and house of Hanover. On the thirtieth of June, the commissioner adjourned the parliament after having thanked them for their cheerfulness and unanimity in their proceedings; and the chiefs of the opposite parties hastened to London to make their different representations to the queen and her ministry: in the mean time, she appointed commissioners for treating about the union; and they met at the cockpit on the twenty-second of October: on the twentieth of the next month, they adjusted preliminaries, importing, that nothing agreed on among themselves should be binding except ratified by her majesty and the respective parliaments of both nations, and that unless all the heads proposed for the treaty were agreed to no particular thing agreed on should be binding: the queen visited them in December, in order to quicken their mutual endeavors. They agreed that the two kingdoms should be inseparably united into one monarchy, under her majesty, her heirs and successors, and under the same limitations, according to the acts of settlement; but, when the Scottish commissioners proposed that the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies should be preserved and maintained, such a difficulty arose as could not be surmounted, and no farther progress was made in this commission. The tranquillity of Ireland was not interrupted by any new commotion: that kingdom was ruled by justices whom the earl of Rochester had appointed; and the trustees for the forfeited estates maintained their authority.

10. While Britain was engaged in these civil transactions, her allies were not idle on the continent: the old duke of Zell, and his nephew, the elector of Brunswick, surprised the dukes of Wolfenbuttle and Saxe-Gotha, whom they compelled to renounce their attachments to France, and concur in the common councils of the empire: thus the north of Germany was re-united to the interests of the confederates; and the princes would have been in a condition to assist them effectually, had not the neighborhood of the war in Poland deterred them from parting with their forces. England and the States-General endeavored in vain to mediate a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland: Charles was become enamored of war, and ambitious of conquest: he threatened to invade Saxony through the dominions of Prussia: Augustus retired to Cracow, while Charles penetrated to Warsaw, and even ordered the cardinal-primate to summon a diet for choosing a new king. The situation of affairs at this juncture was far from being favorable to the allies: the court of Vienna had tampered in vain with the elector of Bavaria, who made use of this negotiation to raise his terms with Louis: his brother, the elector of Cologne, admitted French garrisons into Liege, and all his places on the Rhine: the elector of Saxony was too hard pressed by the king of Sweden to spare his full proportion of troops to the allies; the king of Prussia was over-awed by the vicinity of the Swedish conqueror; the duke of Savoy had joined his forces to those of France, and over-run the whole state of Milan; and the pope, though he professed a neutrality, evinced himself strongly biassed to the French interests.

11. The war was begun in the name of the elector-palatine with the siege of Keiserswaert, which was invested in the month of April by the prince of Nassau-Saarburg, mareschal-de-camp to the emperor: under this officer the Dutch troops served as auxiliaries, because war had not yet been declared by the States-General. The French garrisons made a desperate defence: they worsted the besiegers in divers sallies, and maintained the place until it was reduced to a heap of ashes: at length, the allies made a general attack on the counterscarp and ravelin, which they carried after a very obstinate engagement, with the loss of 2000 men : then the garrison capitulated on honorable terms, and the fortifications were rased. During this siege, which lasted from the eighteenth of April to the middle of June, count Tallard posted himself on the opposite side of the Rhine, from whence he supplied the town with fresh troops and ammunition, and annoyed the besiegers with his artillery ; but finding it impossible to save the place, he joined the grand army, commanded by the duke of Burgundy in the Netherlands. The siege of Keiserswaert was covered by a body of Dutch troops under the earl of Athlone, who lay encamped in the duchy of Cleve : meanwhile general Coshorn, at the head of another detachment, entered Flanders, demolished the French lines between the forts of Donat and Isabella, and laid the chatellany of Bruges under contribution : but a considerable body of French troops advancing under the marquis de Bedmar and the count de la Motte, he overflowed the country, and retired under the walls of Sluys. The duke of Burgundy, who had taken the command of the French army under Boufflers, encamped at Zanten, near Cleve, and laid a scheme for surprising Nimeguen, in which however he was baffled by the vigilance and activity of Athlone, who, guessing his design, marched thither, and encamped under the cannon of the town. In the beginning of June, Landau was invested by prince Louis of Baden ; in July, the king of the Romans arrived in the camp of the besiegers with such pomp and magnificence as exhausted his father's treasury : on the ninth of September the citadel was taken by assault, and then the town surrendered.

12. When the earl of Marlborough arrived in Holland, the earl of Athlone, in quality of veldt-mareschal, insisted on an equal command with the English general : but the States obliged him to yield this point in favor of Marlborough, whom they declared generalissimo of all their forces. In the beginning of July he repaired to the camp at Nimeguen, where he soon assembled an army of 60,000 men, well provided with all necessaries ; then he convoked a council of the general officers, to concert the operations of the campaign : on the sixteenth of the month he passed the Maese, and encamped at Over-asselt, within two leagues and a half of the enemy, who had intrenched themselves between Goch and Gedap : he afterwards repassed the river below the Grave, and removed to Gravenbroeck, where he was joined by the British train of artillery from Holland : on the second of August, he advanced to Petit Brugel, and the French retired before him, leaving Spanish Guelderland to his discretion : he had resolved to hazard an engagement, and issued orders accordingly ; but he was restrained by the Dutch deputies, who were afraid of their own interest, in case the battle should have proved unfortunate. The duke of Burgundy, finding himself obliged to retreat before the allied army, rather than expose himself longer to such a mortifying indignity, returned to Versailles, leaving the command to Boufflers, who lost the confidence of Louis by the ill success of this campaign. The deputies of the States-General having represented to the earl of Marlborough the advantages that would accrue to Holland from his dispossessing the enemy of the places they maintained in the Spanish Guelderland, by which the navigation of the Maese was obstructed, and the important town of Maestricht in a manner blocked up, he resolved to deliver them from such a troublesome neighborhood : he detached general Schultz with a body of troops to reduce the town and castle of Werk, which were surrendered after a slight resistance : in the beginning of September, he undertook the siege of Venlo, which capitulated on the twenty-fifth of the month, after fort St. Michael had been stormed and taken by lord Cutts and the English volunteers, among whom the young earl of Huntingdon distinguished himself by very extraordinary acts of valor : then the general invested Ruremonde, which he reduced after a very obstinate defence, together with the fort of Stevensuaert, situated on the same river. Boufflers, confounded at the rapidity of Marlborough's success, retired towards Liege, in order to cover that city ; but at the approach of the confederates, he retired with precipitation to Tongeren, from whence he directed his route towards Brabant, with a view to defend such places as the allies had no design to attack. When the earl of Marlborough arrived at Liege, he found the suburbs of St. Walburg had been set on fire by the French garrison, who had retired to the citadel and the Chartreux : the allies took immediate possession of the city ; and in a few days opened the trenches against the citadel, which was taken by assault : on this occasion, the hereditary prince of Hesse-Cassel charged at the head of the grenadiers, and was the first person who mounted the breach : Violani the governor and the duke of Charost were made prisoners : 300,000 florins in gold and silver were found in the citadel, besides notes for above 1,000,000, drawn on substantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money: immediately after this exploit, the garrison of the Chartreux capitulated on honorable terms, and were conducted to Antwerp. By the success of this campaign, the earl of Marlborough raised his military character above all censure, and confirmed himself in the intire confidence of the States-General, who, in the beginning of the season, had trembled for Nimeguen, and now saw the enemy driven back into their own domains.

13. When the army broke up in November, the general repaired to Maestricht, from whence he proposed to return to the Hague by water: accordingly, he embarked in a large boat, with five-and-twenty soldiers, under the command of a lieutenant: next morning he was joined at Ruremonde by Coehorn, in a large vessel, with sixty men; and they were moreover escorted by fifty troopers, who rode along the bank of the river: the large boat outsailed the other, and the horsemen mistook their way in the dark. A French partisan, with five-and-thirty men from Gueldres, who lurked among the rushes in wait for prey, seized the rope by which the boat was drawn, hauled it ashore, discharged their small arms and hand-grenades; then rushing into it, secured the soldiers before they could put themselves in a posture of defence: the earl of Marlborough was accompanied by general Opdam, and Mynheer Gueldermalsen, one of the deputies, who were provided with passports: the earl had neglected this precaution; but recollecting he had an old passport for his brother general Churchill, he produced it without any emotion; and the partisan was in such confusion that he never examined the date: nevertheless, he rifled their baggage, carried off the guard as prisoners, and allowed the boat to proceed. The governor of Venlo, receiving information that the earl was surprised by a party, and conveyed to Gueldres, immediately marched out with his whole garrison to invest that place: the same imperfect account being transmitted to Holland, filled the whole province with consternation: the States forthwith assembling, resolved that all their forces should march immediately to Gueldres, and threaten the garrison of the place with the utmost extremities unless they would immediately deliver the general; but, before these orders could be despatched, the earl arrived at the Hague, to the inexpressible joy of the people, who already looked on him as their savior and protector.

14. The French arms were not quite so unfortunate on the Rhine as in Flanders: the elector of Bavaria surprised the city of Ulm in Suabia by a stratagem, and then declared for France, which had by this time complied with all his demands: the diet of the empire, assembled at Ratisbon, were so incensed at his conduct in seizing the city of Ulm by perfidy, that they presented a memorial to his imperial majesty, requesting he would proceed against the elector, according to the constitutions of the empire: they resolved, by a plurality of voices, to declare war in the name of the empire, against the French king and the duke of Anjou, for having invaded several fiefs of the empire in Italy, the archbishopric of Cologne, and the diocese of Liege; and they forbade the ministers of Bavaria and Cologne to appear in the general diet. In vain did these powers protest against their proceedings: the empire's declaration of war was published and notified, in the name of the diet, to the cardinal of Limburg, the emperor's commissioner: meanwhile the French made themselves masters of Neuburg, in the circle of Suabia; while Louis, prince of Baden, being weakened by sending off detachments, was obliged to lie inactive in his camp near Fridlinguen. The French army was divided into two bodies, commanded by the marquis de Villars and the count de Guiscard; and the prince, thinking himself in danger of being enclosed by the enemy, resolved to decamp: Villars immediately passed the Rhine, to fall on him in his retreat; and an obstinate engagement ensuing, the imperialists were overpowered by numbers: the prince, having lost 2000 men, abandoned the field of battle to the enemy, together with his baggage, artillery, and ammunition, and retired towards Stauffen, without being pursued: the French army, even after they had gained the battle, were unaccountably seized with such a panic, that if the imperial general had faced them with two regiments, he would have snatched the victory from Villars, who was on this occasion saluted marshal of France by the soldiers; and next day the town of Fridlinguen surrendered. The prince, being joined by some troops under general Thungen, and other reinforcements, resolved to give battle to the enemy; but Villars declined an engagement, and re-passed the Rhine: towards the latter end of October, count Tallard and the marquis de Lomarie, with a body of 18,000 men, reduced Triers and Traerbach: on the other hand, the prince of Hesse-Cassel, with a detachment from the allied army at Liege, retook from the French the towns of Zinch, Lintz, Brisac, and Andernach.

15. In Italy, prince Eugene labored under a total neglect of the imperial court, where his enemies, on pretence of supporting the king of the Romans in his first campaign, weaned the emperor's attention intirely from his affairs on the other side of the Alps, so that he left his best army to moulder away for want of recruits and reinforcements. The prince, thus abandoned, could not prevent the duke de Vendome from relieving Mantua, and was obliged to relinquish some other places he had taken : Philip, king of Spain, being inspired with the ambition of putting an end to the war in this country, sailed in person for Naples, where he was visited by the cardinal-legate, with a compliment from the pope ; yet he could not obtain the investiture of the kingdom from his holiness : the emperor, however, was so disgusted at the embassy which the pope had sent to Philip, that he ordered his ambassador at Rome to withdraw : Philip proceeded from Naples to Final, under convoy of the French fleet, which had brought him to Italy : here he had an interview with the duke of Savoy, who began to be alarmed at the prospect of the French king being master of the Milanese ; and, in a letter to the duke de Vendome, he forbade him to engage prince Eugene until he himself should arrive in the camp. Prince Eugene, understanding that the French army intended to attack Luzzara and Guastalla, passed the Po with an army of about half the number of the enemy, and posted himself behind the dyke of Zero, in such a manner that the French were ignorant of his situation : he concluded, that on their arrival at the ground they had chosen, the horse would march out to forage, while the rest of the army would be employed in pitching tents, and providing for their refreshment : his design was to seize that opportunity of attacking them, not doubting that he should obtain a complete victory ; but he was disappointed by mere accident : an adjutant, with an advanced guard, had the curiosity to ascend the dyke, in order to view the country, when he discovered the imperial infantry lying on their faces, and their horses in the rear, ranged in order of battle : the French camp was immediately alarmed ; and as the intermediate ground was covered with hedges, which obliged the assailants to defile, the enemy were in a posture of defence before the imperialists could advance to action : nevertheless, the prince attacked them with great vivacity, in hopes of disordering their line, which gave way in several places; but night interposing, he was obliged to desist; and in a few days the French reduced Luzzara and Guastalla: the prince, however, maintained his post; and Philip returned to Spain, without having obtained any considerable advantage.

16. The French king employed all his artifice and intrigues in raising up new enemies against the confederates: he is said to have bribed count Mansfield, president of the council of war at Vienna, to withhold the supplies from prince Eugene in Italy: at the Ottoman Porte he had actually gained over the visir, who engaged to renew the war with the emperor: but the mufti and all the other great officers were averse to this design, and the visir fell a sacrifice to their resentment. Louis continued to embroil the kingdom of Poland by means of the cardinal-primate: the young king of Sweden advanced to Lissau, where he defeated Augustus: then he took possession of Cracow, and raised contributions; nor could he be persuaded to retreat, although the Muscovites and Lithuanians had ravaged Livonia, and even made an irruption into Sweden.

17. The operations of the combined squadrons at sea did not fully answer the expectation of the public: on the twelfth of May, Sir John Munden sailed with twelve ships, to intercept a French squadron appointed as a convoy to a new viceroy of Mexico from Corunna to the West-Indies: on the twenty-eighth of the month, he chased fourteen sail of French ships into Corunna: then he called a council of war, in which it was agreed, that as the place was strongly fortified, and by the intelligence they had received it appeared that seventeen of the enemy's ships of war rode at anchor in the harbor, it would be expedient for them to follow the latter part of their instructions, by which they were directed to cruise in soundings for the protection of the trade: they returned accordingly; and being distressed by want of provisions, came into port, to the general discontent of the nation: for the satisfaction of the people, Sir John Munden was tried by a court-martial, and acquitted; but as this miscarriage had rendered him very unpopular, prince George dismissed him from the service. We have already hinted, that king William had projected a scheme to reduce Cadiz, with intention to act afterwards against the Spanish settlements in the West-Indies: this design queen Anne resolved to put in execution: Sir George Rooke commanded the fleet, and the duke of Ormond was appointed general of the land forces destined for this expedition : the combined squadrons amounted to fifty ships of the line, exclusive of frigates, fire-ships, and smaller vessels ; and the number of soldiers embarked was not far short of 14,000. In the latter end of June the fleet sailed from St. Helens : on the twelfth of August they anchored at the distance of two leagues from Cadiz : next day the duke of Ormond summoned the duke of Brancaccio, who was governor, to submit to the house of Austria ; but that officer answered, he would acquit himself honorably of the trust reposed in him by the king : on the fifteenth the duke of Ormond landed with his forces in the bay of Bulls, under cover of a smart fire from some frigates, and repulsed a body of Spanish cavalry ; then he summoned the governor of Fort St. Catharine to surrender ; and received an answer, importing that the garrison was prepared for his reception : a declaration was published in the Spanish language, intimating that the allies did not come as enemies to Spain, but only to free them from the yoke of France, and assist them in establishing themselves under the government of the house of Austria : these professions produced very little effect among the Spaniards, who were either cooled in their attachment to that family, or provoked by the excesses of the English troops : these having taken possession of Fort St. Catharine and Port St. Mary, instead of protecting, plundered the natives, notwithstanding the strict orders issued by the duke of Ormond to prevent this scandalous practice : even some general officers were concerned in the pillage. A battery was raised against Montagorda fort opposite to the Puntal ; but the attempt miscarried, and the troops were re-embarked.

18. Captain Hardy having been sent to water in Lagos-bay, received intelligence that the galleons from the West-Indies had put into Vigo, under convoy of a French squadron : he sailed immediately in quest of Sir George Rooke, who was now on his voyage back to England ; and falling in with him on the sixth of October, communicated the substance of what he had learned : Rooke immediately called a council of war, in which it was determined to alter their course, and attack the enemy at Vigo. He forthwith detached some small vessels for intelligence, and received a confirmation, that the galleons, and the squadron commanded by Chateau Renault, were actually in the harbor : they sailed thither, and appeared before the place on the eleventh of October : the passage into the harbor was narrow, secured by batteries, forts, and breast-works on each side by a strong boom, consisting of iron chains, top-masts, and cables, moored at each end to a seventy-gun ship; and fortified within by five ships of the same strength lying athwart the channel, with their broadsides to the offing. As the first and second rates of the combined fleets were too large to enter, the admirals shifted their flags into smaller ships; and a division of five-and-twenty English and Dutch ships of the line, with their frigates, fire-ships, and ketches, was destined for the service: in order to facilitate the attack, the duke of Ormond landed with 2500 men, at the distance of six miles from Vigo, and took by assault a fort and platform of forty pieces of cannon, at the entrance of the harbor. The British ensign was no sooner seen flying at the top of this fort, than the ships advanced to the attack: vice-admiral Hopson, in the Torbay, crowding all his sail, ran directly against the boom, which was broken by the first shock: then the whole squadron entered the harbor, through a prodigious fire from the enemy's ships and batteries: these last, however, were soon stormed and taken by the grenadiers who had been landed: the great ships lay against the forts at each side of the harbor, which in a little time they silenced; though vice-admiral Hopson narrowly escaped from a fireship by which he was boarded. After a very vigorous engagement, the French, finding themselves unable to cope with such an adversary, resolved to destroy their ships and galleons, that they might not fall into the hands of the victors: they accordingly burned and ran ashore eight ships and as many advice-boats; but ten ships of war were taken, together with eleven galleons: though they had secured the best part of their plate and merchandise before the English fleet arrived, the value of 14,000,000 of pieces of eight, in plate and rich commodities, was destroyed in six galleons that perished; and about half that value was brought off by the conquerors; so that this was a dreadful blow to the enemy, and a noble acquisition to the allies. Immediately after this exploit, Sir George Rooke was joined by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, who had been sent out with a squadron to intercept the galleons: this officer was left to bring home the prizes and dismantle the fortifications, while Rooke returned in triumph to England.

19. The glory which the English acquired in this expedition was in some measure tarnished by the conduct of some officers in the West-Indies: thither admiral Benbow had been detached with a squadron of ten sail, in the course of the preceding year: at Jamaica he received intelligence that Monsieur Du Casse was in the neighborhood of Hispaniola, and resolved to beat up to that island: at Leogane he fell in with a French ship of fifty guns, which her captain ran ashore and blew up: he took several other vessels; and having alarmed Petit-Guavas, bore away for Donna Maria-bay, where he understood that Du Casse had sailed for the coast of Carthage. Benbow resolved to follow the same course, and on the nineteenth of August discovered the enemy's squadron near St. Martha, consisting of ten sail steering along shore: he formed the line, and an engagement ensued, in which he was very ill seconded by some of his captains: nevertheless, the battle continued till night, and he determined to renew it next morning; when he perceived all his ships at the distance of three or four miles astern, except the Ruby, commanded by captain George Walton, who joined him in plying the enemy with chase-guns: on the twenty-first these two ships engaged the French squadron; and the Ruby was so disabled, that the admiral was obliged to send her back to Jamaica: next day the Greenwich, commanded by Wade, was five leagues astern; and the wind changing, the enemy had the advantage of the weather-gage: on the twenty-third the admiral renewed the battle with his single ship, unsustained by the rest of the squadron: on the twenty-fourth his leg was shattered by a chain-shot; notwithstanding which accident, he remained on the quarter-deck in a cradle, and continued the engagement: one of the largest ships of the enemy lying like a wreck on the water, four sail of the English squadron poured their broadsides into her, and then ran to leeward, without paying any regard to the signal for battle: then the French bearing down on the admiral with their whole force, shot away his main topsail-yard, and damaged his rigging in such a manner, that he was obliged to lie by and refit, while they took their disabled ship in tow. During this interval, he called a council of his captains, and expostulated with them on their behavior: they observed, that the French were very strong, and advised him to desist: he plainly perceived that he was betrayed, and with the utmost reluctance returned to Jamaica, having not only lost a leg, but also received a large wound on his face, and another on his arm, while he in person attempted to board the French admiral. Exasperated at the treachery of his captains, he granted a commission to rear-admiral Whetstone and other officers to hold a court-martial, and try them for cowardice: Hudson, of the Pennennis, died before his trial; Kirby and Wade were convicted, and sentenced to be shot; Constable, of the Windsor, was cashiered and imprisoned; Vincent, of the Falmouth, and Fogg, the admiral's own captain of the Breda, were convicted of having signed a paper, that they would not fight under Benbow's command; but, as they behaved gallantly in the action, the court inflicted on them no other punishment than that of a provisional suspension: captain Walton had likewise joined in the conspiracy while he was heated with the fume of intoxication; but he afterwards renounced the engagement, and fought with admirable courage until his ship was disabled. The boisterous manner of Benbow had produced this base confederacy: he was a rough seaman; but remarkably brave, honest, and experienced:<sup>17</sup> he took this miscarriage so much to heart, that he became melancholy; and his grief co-operating with the fever occasioned by his wounds, put a period to his life. Wade and Kirby were sent home in the Bristol; and on their arrival at Plymouth, shot on board of the ship, by virtue of a dead warrant for their immediate execution, which had lain there for some time; the same precaution had been taken in all the western ports, in order to prevent applications in their favor.

20. During these transactions, the queen seemed to be happy in the affection of her subjects: though the continuance of the parliament was limited to six months after the king's decease, she dissolved it by proclamation before the term was expired; and issued writs for electing another, in which the tory interest predominated: in the summer the

<sup>17</sup> When one of his lieutenants expressed his sorrow for the loss of the admiral's leg; 'I am sorry for it too,' replied the gallant Benbow; 'but I had rather have lost them both than have seen this dishonor brought on the English nation: but, do you hear? If another shot should take me off, behave like brave men, and fight it out.' When Du Casse arrived at Carthagen, he wrote a letter to Benbow to this effect:—

'Sir, I had little hope on Monday last but to have supped in your cabin; but it pleased God to order it otherwise: I am thankful for it. As for those cowardly captains who deserted you, hang them up, for, by God, they deserve it. Yours, queen gave audience to the count de Platens, envoy-extraordinary from the elector of Hanover; then she made a progress with her husband to Oxford, Bath, and Bristol, where she was received with all the marks of the most genuine affection. The new parliament meeting on the twentieth of October, Mr. Harley was chosen speaker. The queen, in her speech, declared she had summoned them to assist her in carrying on the just and necessary war in which the nation was engaged: she desired the commons would inspect the accounts of the public receipts and payments, that if any abuses had crept into the management of the finances, they might be detected, and the offenders punished: she told them that the funds assigned in the last parliament had not produced the sums granted; and that the deficiency was not supplied even by the £100,000 which she had paid from her own revenue for the public service: she expressed her concern for the disappointment at Cadiz, as well as for the abuses committed at Port St. Mary, which had obliged her to give directions for the strictest examination of the particulars: she hoped they would find time to consider of some better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and improve that manufacture, which she was determined to encourage: she professed a firm persuasion that the affection of her subjects was the surest pledge of their duty and obedience: she promised to defend and maintain the church as by law established, and to protect her subjects in the full enjoyment of all their rights and liberties: she protested that she relied on their care of her; she said her interest and theirs were inseparable; and that her endeavors should never be wanting to make them all safe and happy. She was presented with a very affectionate address from either house, congratulating her on the glorious success of her arms, and those of her allies, under the command of the earl of Marlborough; but that of the commons was distinguished by an implicated reproach on the late reign, importing that the wonderful progress of her majesty's arms under the earl of Marlborough had signally 'retrieved' the ancient honor and glory of the English nation: this expression had excited a warm debate in the house, in the course of which many severe reflections were made on the memory of king William: at length, the question was put whether the word 'retrieved' should remain; and carried in the affirmative by a majority of one hundred.

21. The strength of the tories appeared in nothing more conspicuous than in their inquiry concerning controverted elections. The borough of Hindon, near Salisbury, was convicted of bribery, and a bill brought in for disfranchising the town; yet no vote passed against the person who exercised this corruption because he happened to be a tory: Mr. Howe was declared duly elected for Gloucestershire, though the majority of the electors had voted for the other candidate: Sir John Packington exhibited a complaint against the bishop of Worcester and his son for having endeavored to prevent his election: the commons having taken it into consideration, resolved that the proceedings of William, lord bishop of Worcester, and his son, had been malicious, unchristian, and arbitrary, in high violation of the liberties and privileges of the commons of England: they voted an address to the queen, desiring her to remove the father from the office of lord-almoner; and they ordered the attorney-general to prosecute the son, after his privilege as member of the convocation should be expired: a counter address was immediately voted, and presented by the lords, beseeching her majesty would not remove the bishop of Worcester from the place of lord-almoner until he should be found guilty of some crime by due course of law; as it was the undoubted right of every lord of parliament and of every subject of England to have an opportunity to make his defence before he suffers any sort of punishment: the queen said she had not as yet received any complaint against the bishop of Worcester; but she looked on it as her undoubted right to continue or displace any servant attending on her own person, when she should think proper. The peers, having received this answer, unanimously resolved that no lord of their house ought to suffer any sort of punishment by any proceedings of the house of commons otherwise than according to the known and ancient rules and methods of parliament. When the commons attended the queen with their address against the bishop, she said she was sorry there was any occasion for such a remonstrance, and that the bishop of Worcester should no longer continue to supply the place of her almoner: this regard to their address was a flagrant proof of her partiality to the tories, who seemed to justify her attachment by their compliance and liberality.

22. In deliberating on the supplies, they agreed to all the demands of the ministry: they voted 40,000 seamen, and the like number of land forces, to act in conjunction with those of the allies: for the maintenance of these last, they granted £833,826, besides £350,000 for guards and garrisons; £70,973 for ordnance; and £51,843 for subsidies to the allies. Lord Shannon arriving with the news of the success at Vigo, the queen appointed a day of thanksgiving for the signal success of her arms under the earl of Marlborough, the duke of Ormond, and Sir George Rooke; and, on that day, which was the twelfth of November, she went in state to St. Paul's church, attended by both houses of parliament: next day the peers voted the thanks of their house to the duke of Ormond for his services at Vigo; and, at the same time, drew up an address to the queen, desiring she would order the duke of Ormond and Sir George Rooke to lay before them an account of their proceedings; a request with which her majesty complied: those two officers were likewise thanked by the house of commons: vice-admiral Hopson was knighted, and gratified with a considerable pension. The duke of Ormond, at his return from the expedition, complained openly of Rooke's conduct, and seemed determined to subject him to a public accusation; but that officer was such a favorite among the commons, that the court was afraid to disoblige them by an impeachment, and took great pains to mitigate the duke's resentment: this nobleman was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and Rooke was admitted into the privy-council: a motion, however, being made in the house of lords, that the admiral's instructions and journals relating to the last expedition might be examined, a committee was appointed for that purpose, and prepared an unfavorable report; but it was rejected by a majority of the house; and they voted, that Sir George Rooke had done his duty, pursuant to the councils of war, like a brave officer, to the honor of the British nation.

23. On the twenty-first of November, the queen sent a message to the house of commons by Mr. secretary Hedges recommending farther provision for the prince her husband, in case he should survive her: this message being considered, Mr. Howe moved, that the yearly sum of £100,000 should be settled on the prince in case he should survive her majesty: no opposition was made to the proposal; but warm debates were excited by a clause in the bill, exempting the prince from that part of the act of succession, by which strangers, though naturalised, were rendered incapable of holding employments : this clause related only to those who should be naturalised in a future reign ; and indeed was calculated as a restriction on the house of Hanover. Many members argued against the clause of exemption, because it seemed to imply, that persons already naturalised would be excluded from employments in the next reign, though already possessed of the right of natural-born subjects ; a consequence plainly contradictory to the meaning of the act : others opposed it, because the lords had already resolved by a vote, that they would never pass any bill sent up from the commons, to which a clause foreign to the bill should be tacked ; and this clause they affirmed to be a tack, as an incapacity to hold employments was a circumstance altogether distinct from a settlement in money. The queen expressed uncommon eagerness in behalf of this bill ; and the court influence was managed so successfully, that it passed through both houses, though not without an obstinate opposition, and a formal protest by seven-and-twenty peers.

24. The earl of Marlborough arriving in England about the latter end of November, received the thanks of the commons for his great and signal services, which were so acceptable to the queen, that she created him a duke, gratified him with a pension of £5000 on the revenue of the post-office during his natural life, and, in a message to the commons, expressed a desire that they would find some method to settle it on the heirs-male of his body : this intimation was productive of warm debates, during which Sir Christopher Musgrave observed that he would not derogate from the duke's eminent services ; but he affirmed his grace had been very well paid for them by the profitable employments which he and his duchess enjoyed. The duke, understanding that the commons were heated by the subject, begged her majesty would rather forego her gracious message in his behalf, than create any uneasiness on his account, which might embarrass her affairs and be of ill consequence to the public : then she sent another message to the house, signifying that the duke of Marlborough had declined her interposition : notwithstanding this declaration, the commons in a body presented an address, acknowledging the eminent services of the duke of Marlborough, yet expressing their apprehension of making a precedent to alienate the revenue of the crown, which had been so much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the late reign, and so lately settled and secured by her majesty's unparalleled grace and goodness · the queen was satisfied with their apology ; but their refusal in all probability helped to alienate the duke from the tories, with whom he had been hitherto connected.

25. In the beginning of January, the queen gave the house of commons to understand, that the States-General had pressed her to augment her forces, as the only means to render ineffectual the great and early preparations of the enemy : the commons immediately resolved, that 10,000 men should be hired, as an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies ; but on condition that an immediate stop should be put to all commerce and correspondence with France and Spain on the part of the States-General : the lords presented an address to the queen on the same subject, and to the same effect ; and she owned that the condition was absolutely necessary for the good of the whole alliance. The Dutch, even after the declaration of war, had carried on a traffic with the French ; and, at this very juncture, Louis found it impossible to make remittances of money to the elector of Bavaria in Germany, and to his forces in Italy, except through the channel of English, Dutch, and Geneva merchants. The States-General, though shocked at the imperious manner in which the parliament of England prescribed their conduct, complied with the demand without hesitation, and published a prohibition of all commerce with the subjects of France and Spain.

26. The commons of this parliament had nothing more at heart than a bill against occasional conformity : the tories affected to distinguish themselves as the only true friends to the church and monarchy ; and they hated the dissenters with a mixture of spiritual and political disgust : they looked on these last as an intruding sect, which constituted great part of the whig faction that extorted such immense sums of money from the nation in the late reign, and involved it in pernicious engagements, from whence it had no prospect of deliverance : they considered them as encroaching schismatics that disgraced and endangered the hierarchy ; and those of their own communion who recommended moderation, they branded with the epithets of lukewarm christians, betrayers, and apostates : they now resolved to approve themselves zealous sons of the church, by seizing the first opportunity that was in their power to distress the dissenters. In order to pave the way to this persecution, sermons were preached and pamphlets were printed, to blacken the character of the sect, and inflame the popular resentment against them: on the fourth of November, Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, and Mr. Annesley were ordered by the house of commons to bring in a bill for preventing occasional conformity: in the preamble, all persecution for conscience-sake was condemned; nevertheless it enacted that all those who had taken the sacrament and test for offices of trust, or the magistracy of corporations, and afterwards frequented any meeting of dissenters, should be disabled from holding their employments, pay a fine of £100, and five pounds for every day in which they continued to act in their employments after having been at any such meeting: they were also rendered incapable of holding any other employment till after one whole year's conformity; and, on a relapse, the penalties and time of incapacity were doubled. The promoters of the bill alleged, that an established religion and national church were absolutely necessary, when so many impious men pretended to inspiration, and deluded such numbers of the people; that the most effectual way to preserve this national church would be the maintenance of the civil power in the hands of those who expressed their regard to the church in their principles and practice; that the parliament, by the corporation and test acts, thought they had raised a sufficient barrier to the hierarchy, never imagining that a set of men would rise up, whose consciences would be too tender to obey the laws, but hardened enough to break them; that, as the last reign began with an act in favor of dissenters, so the commons were desirous that in the beginning of her majesty's auspicious government an act should pass in favor of the church of England; that this bill did not entrench on the act of toleration, or deprive the dissenters of any privileges they enjoyed by law, or add any thing to the legal rights of the church of England; that occasional conformity was an evasion of the law, by which the dissenters might insinuate themselves into the management of all corporations; that a separation from the church, to which a man's conscience will allow him occasionally to conform, is a mere schism, which in itself was sinful, without the superaddition of a temporal law to make it an offence; that the toleration was intended only for the ease of tender consciences, and not to give a license for occasional conformity; that conforming and non-conforming were contradictions; for nothing but a firm persuasion that the terms of communion required are sinful and unlawful could justify the one; and this plainly condemns the other. The members who opposed the bill argued, that the dissenters were generally well affected to the present constitution; that to bring any real hardship on them, or give rise to jealousies and fears at such a juncture, might be attended with dangerous consequences; that the toleration had greatly contributed to the security and reputation of the church, and plainly proved that liberty of conscience and gentle measures were the most effectual means for increasing the votaries of the church, and diminishing the number of dissenters; that the dissenters could not be termed schismatics without bringing a heavy charge on the church of England, which had not only tolerated such schism, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad; that the penalties of this bill were more severe than those which the laws imposed on papists for assisting at the most solemn act of their religion; in a word, that toleration and tenderness had been always productive of peace and union, whereas persecution had never failed to excite disorder, and extend superstition: many alterations and mitigations were proposed without effect: in the course of the debates, the dissenters were mentioned and reviled with great acrimony; and the bill passed the lower house by virtue of a considerable majority.

27. The lords, apprehensive that the commons would tack it to some money-bill, voted that the annexing any clause to a money-bill was contrary to the constitution of the English government and the usage of parliament. The bill met with a very warm opposition in the upper house, where a considerable portion of the whig interest still remained: these members believed that the intention of the bill was to model corporations, so as to eject all those who would not vote in elections for the tories: some imagined this was a preparatory step towards a repeal of the toleration; and others concluded that the promoters of the bill designed to raise such disturbances at home, as would discourage the allies abroad, and render the prosecution of the war impracticable: the majority of the bishops, and among these Burnet of Sarum, objected against it on the principles of moderation, and from motives of conscience; nevertheless, as the court supported this measure with its whole power and influence, the bill made its way through the house, though not without alterations and amendments, which were rejected by the commons. The lower house pretended, that the lords had no right to alter any fines and penalties that the commons should fix in bills sent up for their concurrence, on the supposition that those were matters concerning money, the peculiar province of the lower house: the lords ordered a minute inquiry to be made into all the rolls of parliament since the reign of Henry VII.; and a great number of instances were found, in which the lords had begun the clauses imposing fines and penalties, altered the penalties which had been fixed by the commons, and even changed the uses to which they were applied: these precedents were entered in the books; but the commons resolved to maintain their point without engaging in any dispute on the subject. After warm debates, and a free conference between the two houses, the lords adhered to their amendments, though this resolution was carried by a majority of one vote only: the commons persisted in rejecting them; the bill miscarried, and both houses published their proceedings, by way of appeal to the nation.<sup>18</sup> A bill was now brought into the lower house, granting another year's consideration to those who had not taken the oath abjuring the pretended prince of Wales: the lords added three clauses, importing that those persons who should take the oath within the limited time might return to their benefices and employments, unless they should be already legally filled; that any person endeavoring to defeat the succession to the crown, as now limited by law, should be deemed guilty of high-treason; and that the oath of abjuration should be imposed on the subjects in Ireland: the commons made some opposition to the first clause; but, at length, the question being put, whether they should agree to the amendments, it was carried in the affirmative by one voice.

28. No object engrossed more time or produced more violent debates than did the inquiry into the public accounts. The commissioners appointed for this purpose pretended to have made great discoveries : they charged the earl of Ranelagh, paymaster-general of the army, with flagrant mismanagement : he acquitted himself in such a manner as screened him from all severity of punishment ; nevertheless, they expelled him from the house for a high crime and misdemeanor, in misapplying several sums of the public money ; and he thought proper to resign his employment. A long address was prepared and presented to the queen, attributing the national debt to mismanagement of the funds ; complaining that the old methods of the exchequer had been neglected ; and that iniquitous frauds had been committed by the commissioners of the prizes : previous to this remonstrance, the house, in consequence of the report of the committee, had passed several severe resolutions, particularly against Charles, lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of the exchequer, as having neglected his duty, and been guilty of a breach of trust : for these reasons, they actually besought the queen, in an address, that she would give directions to the attorney-general to prosecute him for the said offences ; and she promised to comply with their request : on the other hand, the lords appointed a committee to examine all the observations which the commissioners of accounts had offered to both houses : they ascribed the national debt to deficiencies in the funds ; they acquitted lord Halifax, the lords of the treasury, and their officers, whom the commons had accused ; and represented these circumstances in an address to the queen, which was afterwards printed with the vouchers to every particular. This difference blew up a fierce flame of discord between the two houses, which manifested their mutual animosity in speeches, votes, resolutions, and conferences : the commons affirmed, that no cognisance the lords could take of the public accounts would enable them to supply any deficiency, or appropriate any surplusage of the public money ; that they could neither acquit nor condemn any person whatsoever, on any inquiry arising originally in their own house, and that their attempt to acquit Charles, lord Halifax, was unparliamentary : the lords insisted on their right to take cognisance originally of all public accounts : they affirmed that in their resolutions with respect to lord Halifax they had proceeded according to the rules of justice : they owned, however, that their resolutions did not amount to any judgment or acquittal ; but that finding a vote of the commons reflected on a member of their house, they thought fit to give their opinion in their legislative capacity. The queen interposed by a message to the lords, desiring they would despatch the business in which they were engaged: the dispute continued even after this intimation: one conference was held after another, till at length both sides despaired of an accommodation: the lords ordered their proceedings to be printed, and the commons followed their example. On the twenty-seventh of February, the queen, having passed all the bills that were ready for the royal assent, ordered the lord-keeper to prorogue the parliament, after having pronounced a speech in the usual style: she thanked them for their zeal, affection, and despatch; declared she would encourage and maintain the church as by law established; desired they would consider some farther laws for restraining the great license assumed for publishing scandalous pamphlets and libels; and assured them, that all her share of the prizes which might be taken in the war should be applied to the public service. By this time the earl of Rochester was intirely removed from the queen's councils: finding himself out-weighted by the interest of the duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin, he had become sullen and intractable; and, rather than repair to his government of Ireland, chose to resign the office, which, as we have already observed, was conferred on the duke of Ormond, an accomplished nobleman, who had acquired great popularity by the success of the expedition to Vigo. The parties in the house of lords were so nearly matched, that the queen, in order to ascertain an undoubted majority in the next session, created four new peers,<sup>19</sup> who had signalised themselves by the violence of their speeches in the house of commons.

<sup>18</sup> While this bill was depending, Daniel de Foe published a pamphlet entitled, 'The shortest Way with the Dissenters, or Proposals for the Establishment of the Church.' The piece was a severe satire on the violence of the church party: the commons ordered it to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, and the author to be prosecuted: he was accordingly committed to Newgate, tried, condemned to pay a fine of £200, and stand in the pillory.

29. The two houses of convocation, which were summoned with the parliament, bore a strong affinity with this assembly, by the different interests that prevailed in the upper and lower: the last, in imitation of the commons, was desirous of branding the preceding reign; and it was with great difficulty that they concurred with the prelates in an address of congratulation to her majesty: then their former contest was revived: the lower house desired, in an application to the archbishop of Canterbury and his suffragans, that the matters in dispute concerning the manner of synodical proceedings, and the right of the lower house to hold intermediate assemblies, might be taken into consideration, and speedily determined: the bishops proposed, that in the intervals of sessions, the lower house might appoint committees to prepare matters; and when business should be brought regularly before them, the archbishop would regulate the prorogations in such a manner, that they should have sufficient time to sit and deliberate on the subject: this offer did not satisfy the lower house, which was emboldened to persist in its demand by a vote of the commons: these, in consequence of an address of thanks from the clergy, touching Mr. Lloyd, son to the bishop of Worcester, whom they ordered to be prosecuted after his privilege as member of the convocation should be expired, had resolved that they would on all occasions assert the just rights and privileges of the lower house of convocation: the prelates refused to depart from the archbishop's right of proroguing the whole convocation with consent of his suffragans: the lower house proposed to refer the controversy to the queen's decision: the bishops declined this expedient, as inconsistent with the episcopal authority, and the presidency of the archbishop. The lower house having incurred the imputation of favoring presbytery by this opposition to the bishops, entered in their books a declaration, acknowledging the order of bishops as superior to presbyters, and to be a divine apostolical institution: then they desired the bishops, in an address, to concur in settling the doctrine of the divine apostolical right of episcopacy, that it might be a standing rule of the church: they likewise presented a petition to the queen, complaining, that in the convocation called in the year 1700, after an interruption of ten years, several questions having arisen concerning the rights and liberties of the lower house, the bishops had refused a verbal conference; and afterwards declined a proposal to submit the dispute to her majesty's determination: they therefore fled for protection to her majesty, begging she would call the question into her own royal audience. The queen promised to consider their petition, which was supported by the earl of Nottingham; and ordered their council to examine the affair, how it consisted with law and custom: whether their report was unfavorable to the lower house, or the queen was unwilling to encourage the division, no other answer was made to their address: the archbishop replied to their request presented to the upper house, concerning the divine right of presbytery, that the preface to the form of ordination contained a declaration of three orders of ministers from the times of the apostles; namely, bishops, priests, and deacons, to which they had subscribed: but he and his brethren conceived, that, without a royal license, they had not authority to attempt, enact, promulge, or execute any canon, which should concern either doctrine or discipline. The lower house answered this declaration in very petulant terms; and the dispute subsisted when the parliament was prorogued: but these contests produced divisions through the whole body of the clergy, who ranged themselves in different factions, distinguished by the names of high-church and low-church: the first consisted of ecclesiastical tories; the other included those who professed revolution principles, and recommended moderation towards the dissenters: the high-church party reproached the other as time-servers, and presbyterians in disguise; and were, in their turn, stigmatised as the friends and abettors of tyranny and persecution: at present, however, the tories both in church and state triumphed in the favor of their sovereign: the right of parliaments, the memory of the late king, and even the act limiting the succession of the house of Hanover became the subjects of ridicule: the queen was flattered as possessor of the prerogatives of the ancient monarchy: the history written by her grandfather, the earl of Clarendon, was now for the first time published, to inculcate the principles of obedience, and inspire the people with an abhorrence of opposition to an anointed sovereign: her majesty's hereditary right was deduced from Edward the Confessor; and, as heir of his pretended sanctity and virtue, she was persuaded to touch persons afflicted with the king's evil, according to the office inserted in the liturgy for this occasion.

30. The change of the ministry in Scotland seemed favorable to the episcopalians and anti-revolutioners of that kingdom: the earls of Marchmont, Melvil, Selkirk, Leven, and Hyndford were laid aside; the earl of Seafield was appointed chancellor; the duke of Queensbury and the lord viscount Tarbat were declared secretaries of state; the marquis of

Annandale was made president of the council, and the earl of Tullibardine lord privy-seal. A new parliament having been summoned, the earl of Seafield employed his influence so successfully, that a great number of anti-revolutioners were returned as members: the duke of Hamilton had obtained from the queen a letter to the privy-council in Scotland, in which she expressed her desire that the presbyterian clergy should live in brotherly love and communion with such dissenting ministers of the reformed religion as were in possession of benefices, and lived with decency and submission to the law: the episcopal clergy, encouraged by these expressions in their favor, drew up an address to the queen, imploring her protection, and humbly beseeching her to allow those parishes in which there was a majority of episcopal freeholders to bestow the benefice on ministers of their principles: this petition was presented by Dr. Skeen and Dr. Scott, who were introduced by the duke of Queensbury to her majesty. She assured them of her protection and endeavors to supply their necessities; and exhorted them to live in peace and christian love with the clergy, who were by law invested with the church-government in her ancient kingdom of Scotland. A proclamation of indemnity having been published in March, a great number of Jacobites returned from France and other countries, pretended to have changed their sentiments, and took the oaths, that they might be qualified to sit in parliament: they formed an accession to the strength of the anti-revolutioners and episcopalians, who now hoped to outnumber the presbyterians, and outweigh their interest: but this confederacy was composed of dissonant parts, from which no harmony could be expected: the presbyterians and revolutioners were headed by the duke of Argyle; the country-party of malcontents, which took its rise from the disappointments of the Darien settlement, acted under the auspices of the duke of Hamilton and marquis of Tweeddale; and the earl of Hume appeared as chief of the anti-revolutioners. The different parties, who now united, pursued the most opposite ends: the majority of the country-party were friends to the revolution, and sought only redress of the grievances which the nation had sustained in the late reign: the anti-revolutioners considered the accession and government of king William as an extraordinary event, which they were willing to forget; believing that all parties were safe under the shelter of her majesty's general indemnity: the Jacobites submitted to the queen, as tutrix or regent for the prince of Wales, whom they firmly believed she intended to establish on the throne; the whigs under Argyle, alarmed at the coalition of all their enemies, resolved to procure a parliamentary sanction for the revolution.<sup>20</sup>

31. The parliament being opened on the sixth of May, 1703, at Edinburgh, by the duke of Queensbury as commissioner, the queen's letter was read, in which she demanded a supply for the maintenance of the forces, advised them to encourage trade, and exhorted them to proceed with wisdom, prudence, and unanimity: the duke of Hamilton immediately offered the draft of a bill for recognising her majesty's undoubted right and title to the imperial crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the estates of the kingdom, containing the claim of right: it was immediately received; and at the second reading, the queen's advocate offered an additional clause, denouncing the penalties of treason against any person who should question her majesty's right and title to the crown, or her exercise of the government, from her actual entry to the same: this, after a long and warm debate, was carried by the concurrence of the anti-revolutioners: then the earl of Hume produced the draft of a bill for the supply: immediately after it was read, the marquis of Tweeddale made an overture, that, before all other business, the parliament would proceed to make such conditions of government, and regulations in the constitution of the kingdom, to take place after the decease of her majesty and the heirs of her body, as should be necessary for the preservation of their religion and liberty: this overture and the bill were ordered to lie on the table; and, in the mean time, the commissioner found himself involved in great perplexity: the duke of Argyle, the marquis of Annandale, and the earl of Marchmont gave him to understand in private, that they were resolved to move for an act, ratifying the revolution; and for another, confirming the presbyterian government: that they would insist on their being discussed before the bill of supply; and that they were certain of carrying the points at which they aimed. The commissioner now found himself reduced to a very disagreeable alternative: there was a necessity for relinquishing all hope of a supply, or abandoning the anti-revolutioners, to whom he was connected by promises of concurrence: the whigs were determined to oppose all schemes of supply that should come from the cavaliers; and these last resolved to exert their whole power in preventing the confirmation of the revolution and the presbyterian discipline. He foresaw that on this occasion the whigs would be joined by the duke of Hamilton and his party, so as to preponderate against the cavaliers: he endeavored to cajole both parties, but found the task impracticable: he desired in parliament, that the act for the supply might be read, promising that they should have full time afterwards to deliberate on other subjects: the marquis of Tweeddale insisted on his overture; and after warm debates, the house resolved to proceed with such acts as might be necessary for securing the religion, liberty, and trade of the nation, before any bill for supply or other business should be discussed: the marquis of Athol offered an act for the security of the kingdom, in case of her majesty's decease; but, before it was read, the duke of Argyle presented his draft of a bill for ratifying the revolution, and all the acts following thereon. An act for limiting the succession after the death of her majesty and the heirs of her body was produced by Mr. Fletcher, of Saltoun: the earl of Rothes recommended another, importing, that, after her majesty's death, and failing heirs of her body, no person coming to the crown of Scotland, being at the same time king or queen of England, should, as king or queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war without the consent of parliament: the earl of Marchmont recited the draft of an act for securing the true protestant religion and presbyterian government: one was also suggested by Sir Patrick Johnston, allowing the importation of wines and other foreign liquors: all these bills were ordered to lie on the table: then the earl of Strathmore produced an act for toleration to all protestants in the exercise of religious worship; but against this the general assembly presented a most violent remonstrance; and the promoters of the bill, foreseeing that it would meet with great opposition, allowed it to drop for the present. On the third of June, the parliament passed the act for preserving the true reformed protestant religion, and confirming presbyterian church-government, as agreeable to the word of God, and the only government of Christ's church within the kingdom: the same party enjoyed a farther triumph in the success of Argyle's act, for ratifying and perpetuating the first act of king William's parliament; for declaring it high treason to disown the authority of that parliament, or to alter or renovate the claim of right, or any article thereof: this last clause was strenuously opposed; but at last the bill passed, with the concurrence of all the ministry, except the marquis of Athol and the viscount Tarbat, who began at this period to correspond with the opposite party.

32. The cavaliers, thinking themselves betrayed by the duke of Queensbury, who had assented to these acts, first expostulated with him on his breach of promise, and then renounced his interest, resolving to separate themselves from the court, and jointly pursue such measures as might be for the interest of their party: but of all the bills that were produced in the course of this remarkable session, that which produced the most violent altercation was the act of security, calculated to abridge the prerogative of the crown, limit the successor, and throw a vast additional power into the hands of the parliament: it was considered paragraph by paragraph; many additions and alterations were proposed, and some adopted; inflammatory speeches were uttered; bitter sarcasms retorted from party to party; and different votes passed on different clauses: at length, in spite of the most obstinate opposition from the ministry and the cavaliers it was passed by a majority of fifty-nine voices: the commissioner was importuned to give it the royal assent; but declined answering their entreaties till the tenth of September: then he made a speech in parliament, giving them to understand that he had received the queen's pleasure, and was empowered to give the royal assent to all the acts voted in this session, except to the act for the security of the kingdom: a motion was made to solicit the royal assent in an address to her majesty; but the question being put, it was carried in the negative by a small majority. On the sixth of the same month, the earl of Marchmont had produced a bill to settle the succession of the house of Hanover: at first the import of it was not known; but, when the clerk in reading it mentioned the princess Sophia, the whole house was kindled into a flame: some proposed that the overture should be burned; others moved that the earl might be sent prisoner to the castle: and a general dissatisfaction appeared in the whole assembly : not that the majority in parliament were averse to the succession in the house of Hanover ; but they resolved to avoid a nomination without stipulating conditions ; and they had already provided in the act of security, that it should be high-treason to own any person as king or queen after her majesty's decease, until he or she should take the coronation-oath, and accept the terms of the claim of right, and such conditions as should be settled in this or any ensuing parliament.

33. Andrew Fletcher, of Saltoun, a man of undaunted courage and inflexible integrity, who professed republican principles, and seemed designed by nature as a member of some Grecian commonwealth, after having observed that the nation would be enslaved, should it submit, either willingly or by commission, to the successor of England, without such conditions of government as should secure them against the influence of an English ministry, offered the draft of an act, importing, that after the decease of her majesty, without heirs of her body, no person being successor to the English throne should succeed to the crown of Scotland, but under the following limitations, which, together with the coronation-oath and claim of right, they should swear to observe ; namely, that all offices and places, civil and military, as well as pensions, should for the future be conferred by a parliament to be chosen at every Michaelmas head-court, to sit on the first of November ; and adjourn themselves from time to time, till the ensuing Michaelmas ; that they should choose their own president ; that a committee of six-and-thirty members, chosen out of the whole parliament, without distinction of estates, should, during the intervals of parliament, be vested, under the king, with the administration of the government, act as his council, be accountable to parliament, and call it together on extraordinary occasions : he proposed that the successor should be nominated by the majority ; declaring for himself, that he would rather concur in nominating the most rigid papist with those conditions than the truest protestant without them : the motion was seconded by many members ; and though postponed for the present, in favor of an act of trade under the consideration of the house, it was afterwards resumed with great warmth : in vain the lord-treasurer represented that no funds were as yet provided for the army, and moved for a reading of the act presented for that purpose : a certain member observed, that this was a very unseasonable juncture to propose a supply, when the house had so much to do for the security of the nation: he said they had very little encouragement to grant supplies, when they found themselves frustrated of all their labor and expense for these several months; and when the whole kingdom saw that supplies served for no other use but to gratify the avarice of some insatiable ministers. Mr. Fletcher expatiated on the good consequences that would arise from the act which he had proposed: the chancellor answered, that such an act was laying a scheme for a commonwealth, and tending to innovate the constitution of the monarchy: the ministry proposed a state of a vote, whether they should first give a reading to Fletcher's act or to the act of subsidy: the country-party moved that the question might be, 'Overtures for subsidies, or overtures for liberty.' Fletcher withdrew his act, rather than people should pervert the meaning of laudable designs: the house resounded with the cry of 'Liberty or Subsidy:' bitter invectives were uttered against the ministry: one member said it was now plain the nation was to expect no other return for their expense and toil, than that of being loaded with a subsidy, and being obliged to bend their necks under the yoke of slavery, which was prepared for them from that throne: another observed, that as their liberties were suppressed, so the privileges of parliament were like to be torn from them; but that he would venture his life in defence of his birthright, and rather die a free man than live a slave. When the vote was demanded, and declined by the commissioner, the earl of Roxburgh declared, that if there was no other way of obtaining so natural and undeniable a privilege of parliament, they would demand it with their swords in their hands: the commissioner, foreseeing this spirit of freedom and contradiction, ordered the foot-guard to be in readiness, and placed a strong guard on the eastern gate of the city: notwithstanding these precautions, he ran the risk of being torn in pieces; and, in this apprehension, ordered the chancellor to inform the house that the parliament should proceed on overtures for liberty at their next sitting: this promise allayed the ferment which had begun to rise. Next day the members prepared an overture, implying, that the elective members should be chosen for every seat at the Michaelmas head-courts; that a parliament should be held once in two years at least; that the short adjournments de die in diem should be made by the parliaments themselves, as in England; and that no officer in the army, customs, or excise, nor any gratuitous pensioner, should sit as an elective member. The commissioner, being apprised of their proceedings, called for such acts as he was empowered to pass; and having given the royal assent to them, prorogued the parliament to the twelfth of October.<sup>1</sup> Such was the issue of this remarkable session of the Scottish parliament, in which the duke of Queensbury was abandoned by the greatest part of the ministry; and such a spirit of ferocity and opposition prevailed, as threatened the whole kingdom with civil war and confusion. The queen conferred titles on those who appeared to have influence in the nation, and attachment to her government; and revived the order of the thistle, which the late king had dropped.<sup>2</sup>

34. Ireland was filled with discontent by the behavior and conduct of the trustees for the forfeited estates: the earl of Rochester had contributed to foment the troubles of the kingdom by encouraging the factions which had been imported from England: the duke of Ormond was received with open arms, as heir to the virtues of his ancestors, who had been the bulwarks of the protestant interest in Ireland. He opened the parliament on the twenty-first of September, with a speech to both houses, in which he told them, that

<sup>1</sup> Though the queen refused to pass the act of security, the royal assent was granted to an act of limitation on the successor, in which it was declared that no king or queen of Scotland should have power to make war or peace without consent of parliament: another law was enacted, allowing French wines and other liquors to be imported in neutral bottoms: without this expedient, it was alleged that the revenue would have been insufficient to maintain the government: an act passed in favor of the company trading to Africa and the Indies; another for a commission concerning the public accounts; a third for punishing slanderous speeches and writings: the commission for treating of a union with England was vacated, with a prohibition to grant any other commission for that purpose without consent of parliament; and no supply having been provided before the adjournment, the army and expense of government were maintained on credit.

<sup>2</sup> The marquis of Athol and the marquis of Douglas, though this last was a minor, were created dukes; lord Farbat was invested with the title of earl of Cromarty; the viscounts Stair and Roseberry were promoted to the same dignity; lord Boyle was created earl of Glasgow; James Stewart, of Bute, earl of Bute; Charles Hope, of Hopetoun, earl of Hopetoun; John Crawford, of Kilbirnie, viscount Garnock; and Sir James Primrose, of Carrington, viscount Primrose.

his inclination, his interest, and the examples of his progenitors were indispensable obligations on him to improve every opportunity to the advantage and prosperity of his native country. The commons, having chosen Allen Broderick to be their speaker, proceeded to draw up very affectionate addresses to the queen and the lord-lieutenant: in that to the queen they complained that their enemies had misrepresented them, as desirous of being independent of the crown of England: they, therefore, to vindicate themselves from such false aspersions, declared and acknowledged, that the kingdom of Ireland was annexed and united to the imperial crown of England: in order to express their hatred of the trustees, they resolved, that all the protestant freeholders of that kingdom had been falsely and maliciously misrepresented, traduced, and abused, in a book entitled, 'The Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Irish Forfeitures;' and it appearing that Francis Annesley, member of the house, John Trenchard, Henry Langford, and James Hamilton were authors of that book, they farther resolved, that these persons had scandalously and maliciously misrepresented and traduced the protestant freeholders of that kingdom, and endeavored to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the people of England and the protestants of Ireland: Annesley was expelled the house, Hamilton was dead, and Trenchard had returned to England. They had finished the inquiry before the meeting of this parliament; and sold, at an under value, the best of the forfeited estates to the Sword-blade company of England: this, in a petition to the Irish parliament, prayed that heads of a bill be brought in for enabling them to take conveyance of lands in Ireland; but the parliament was very little disposed to confirm the bargains of the trustees, and the petition lay neglected on the table: the house expelled John Asgill, who, as agent to the Sword-blade company, had offered to lend money to the public in Ireland, on condition that the parliament would pass an act to confirm the company's purchase of the forfeited estates: his constituents disowned his proposal; and when he was summoned to appear before the house, and answer for his prevarication, he pleaded his privilege, as member of the English parliament. The commons, in a representation of the state and grievances of the nation, gave her majesty to understand that the constitution of Ireland had been of late greatly shaken, and their lives, liberties, and estates called into question, and tried in a manner unknown to their ancestors ; that the expense to which they had been unnecessarily exposed by the late trustees for the forfeited estates, in defending their just rights and titles, had exceeded in value the current cash of the kingdom ; that their trade was decayed, their money exhausted, and that they were hindered from maintaining their own manufactures ; that many protestant families had been constrained to quit the kingdom, in order to earn a livelihood in foreign countries ; that the want of frequent parliaments in Ireland had encouraged evil-minded men to oppress the subject ; that many civil officers had acquired great fortunes in that impoverished country, by the exercise of corruption and oppression ; that others, in considerable employments, resided in another kingdom, neglecting personal attendance on their duty, while their offices were ill executed, to the detriment of the public, and the failure of justice : they declared, that it was from her majesty's gracious interposition alone they proposed to themselves relief from those their manifold grievances and misfortunes. The commons afterwards voted the necessary supplies, and granted £150,000 to make good the deficiencies of the necessary branches of the establishment.

35. They appointed a committee to inspect the public accounts, by which they discovered, that above £100,000 had been falsely charged as a debt on the nation : the committee was thanked by the house for having saved this sum, and ordered to examine what persons were concerned in such a misrepresentation, which was generally imputed to those who acted under the duke of Ormond : he himself was a nobleman of honor and generosity, addicted to pleasure, and fond of popular applause ; but he was surrounded by people of more sordid principles, who had ingratiated themselves into his confidence by the arts of adulation. The commons voted a provision for the half-pay officers ; and abolished pensions to the amount of £17,000 a year, as unnecessary branches of the establishment : they passed an act settling the succession of the crown, after the pattern set them by England ; but the most important transaction of this session was a severe bill to prevent the growth of popery : it bore a strong affinity to that which had passed three years before in England ; but contained more effectual clauses : among others, it enacted that all estates of papists should be equally divided among the children, notwithstanding any settlement to the contrary.

unless the persons to whom they might be settled should qualify themselves by taking the oaths, and communicating with the church of England. The bill was not at all agreeable to the ministry in England, who expected large presents from the papists, by whom a considerable sum had been actually raised for this purpose: but, as they did not think proper to reject such a bill while the English parliament was sitting, they added a clause which they hoped the parliament of Ireland would refuse; namely, that no persons in that kingdom should be capable of any employment, or of being in the magistracy of any city, who did not qualify themselves by receiving the sacrament according to the test-act passed in England: though this was certainly a great hardship on the dissenters, the parliament of Ireland sacrificed this consideration to their common security against the Roman catholics, and accepted the amendment without hesitation. This affair being discussed, the commons of Ireland passed a vote against a book entitled, 'Memoirs of the late king James II.' as a seditious libel: they ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, and the bookseller and printer to be prosecuted: when this motion was made, a member informed the house, that in the county of Limerick the Irish papists had begun to form themselves into bodies, to plunder the protestants of their arms and money, and to maintain a correspondence with the disaffected in England: the house immediately resolved, that the papists of the kingdom still retained hopes of the accession of the person known by the name of the prince of Wales in the lifetime of the late king James, and now by the name of James III. In the midst of this zeal against popery and the pretender, they were suddenly adjourned by the command of the lord-lieutenant, and broke up in great animosity against that nobleman.<sup>3</sup>

36. The attention of the English ministry had been for some time chiefly engrossed by the affairs of the continent: the emperor agreed with the allies, that his son the archduke Charles should assume the title of king of Spain, demand the

<sup>3</sup> They had, besides the bills already mentioned, passed an act for an additional excise on beer, ale, and other liquors; another encouraging the importation of iron and staves; a third for preventing popish priests from coming into the kingdom; a fourth securing the liberty of the subject, and for prevention of imprisonment beyond seas; and a fifth for naturalising all protestant strangers.

infanta of Portugal in marriage, and undertake something of importance, with the assistance of the maritime powers: Mr. Methuen, the English minister at Lisbon, had already made some progress in a treaty with his Portuguese majesty; and the court of Vienna promised to send such an army into the field as would in a little time drive the elector of Bavaria from his dominions: but they were so dilatory in their preparations, that the French king broke all their measures, by sending powerful reinforcements to the elector, in whose ability and attachment Louis reposed great confidence. Marshal Villars, who commanded an army of 30,000 men at Strasburg, passed the Rhine, and reduced fort Kehl, the garrison of which was conducted to Philipsburg: the emperor, alarmed at this event, ordered count Schlick to enter Bavaria on the side of Saltsburg, with a considerable body of forces; and sent another under count Stirum, to invade the same electorate by the way of Newmark, which was surrendered to him, after he had routed a party of Bavarians: the city of Amberg met with the same fate: meanwhile count Schlick defeated a body of militia that defended the lines of Saltsburg, and made himself master of Riedt and several other places. The elector, assembling his forces near Brenau, diffused a report that he intended to besiege Passau, to cover which place Schlick advanced with the greatest part of his infantry, leaving behind his cavalry and cannon: the elector, having by this feint divided the imperialists, passed the bridge of Scardingen with 12,000 men, and, after an obstinate engagement, compelled the imperialists to abandon the field of battle: then he marched against the Saxon troops which guarded the artillery; and attacked them with such impetuosity, that they were intirely defeated: in a few days after these actions, he took Newburg on the Inn by capitulation: he obtained another advantage over an advanced post of the imperialists near Burgenfelt, commanded by the young prince of Brandenburg-Anspach, who was mortally wounded in the engagement: he advanced to Ratisbon, where the diet of the empire was assembled; and demanded that he should be immediately put in possession of the bridge and gate of the city: the burghers immediately took to their arms, and planted cannon on the ramparts; but when they saw a battery erected against them, and the elector determined to bombard the place, they thought proper to capitulate, and comply with his demands: he took possession of the town on the eighth of April, and signed an instrument obliging himself to withdraw his troops as soon as the emperor should ratify the diet's resolution for the neutrality of Ratisbon. Marshal Villars, having received orders to join the elector at all events, and being reinforced by a body of troops under count Tallard, resolved to break through the lines which the prince of Baden had made at Stollhoffen: this general had been luckily joined by eight Dutch battalions, and received the French army, though double his number, with such obstinate resolution, that Villars was obliged to retreat with great loss, and directed his route towards Offingen: nevertheless he penetrated through the Black-Forest, and effected a junction with the elector. Count Stirum endeavored to join prince Louis of Baden; but being attacked near Schwemmingen, retired under the cannon of Nordlingen.

37. The confederates were more successful on the Lower Rhine and in the Netherlands: the duke of Marlborough crossed the sea in the beginning of April; and assembling the allied army, resolved that the campaign should be begun with the siege of Bonne, which was accordingly invested on the twenty-fourth of April: three different attacks were carried on against this place; one by the hereditary prince of Hesse-Cassel; another by the celebrated Coehorn; and a third by lieutenant-general Fagel. The garrison defended themselves vigorously till the fourteenth of May, when the fort having been taken by assault, and the breaches rendered practicable, the marquis d'Alegre, the governor, ordered a parley to be beat: hostages were immediately exchanged; on the sixteenth the capitulation was signed; and in three days the garrison evacuated the place, in order to be conducted to Luxemburg. During the siege of Bonne, the marshals Boufflers and Villeroy advanced with an army of 40,000 men towards Tongeren; and the confederate army, commanded by M. D'Auverquerque was obliged at their approach to retreat under the cannon of Maestricht: the enemy, having taken possession of Tongeren, made a motion against the confederate army, which they found already drawn up in order of battle, and so advantageously posted, that notwithstanding their great superiority in point of number, they would not hazard an attack, but retired to the ground from whence they had advanced. Immediately after the reduction of Bonne, the duke of Marlborough, who had been present at the siege, returned to the confederate army in the Netherlands, now amounting to one hundred and thirty squadrons, and fifty-nine battalions: on the twenty-fifth of May, the duke having passed the river Jecker, in order to give battle to the enemy, they marched with precipitation to Boekwern and abandoned Tongeren, after having blown up the walls of the place with gunpowder: the duke continued to follow them to Thys, where he encamped, while they retreated to Hannye, retiring as he advanced: then he resolved to force their lines: this service was effectually performed by Coehorn, at the point of Callo, and by baron Spaar, in the county of Waes, near Stoken. The duke had formed the design of reducing Antwerp, which was garrisoned by Spanish troops, under the command of the marquis de Bedmar: he intended with the grand army to attack the enemy's lines on the side of Louvain and Mechlin; he detached Coehorn with his flying camp to the right of the Scheldt, towards Dutch Flanders, to amuse the marquis de Bedmar on that side; and he ordered the baron Opdam, with 12,000 men, to take post between Eckeren and Capelle, near Antwerp, that he might act against that part of the lines which was guarded by the Spanish forces.

38. The French generals, in order to frustrate the scheme of Marlborough, resolved to cut off the retreat of Opdam: Boufflers, with a detachment of 20,000 men from Villeroy's army, surprised him at Eckeren, where the Dutch were put in disorder; and Opdam, believing all was lost, fled to Breda: nevertheless, the troops rallying under general Schlangenburg, maintained their ground with the most obstinate valor till night, when the enemy was obliged to retire, and left the communication free with fort Lillo, to which place the confederates marched without farther molestation, having lost about 1500 men in the engagement: the damage sustained by the French was more considerable: they were frustrated in their design, and had actually abandoned the field of battle; yet Louis ordered Te Deum to be sung for the victory: nevertheless, Boufflers was censured for his conduct on this occasion, and in a little time totally disgraced. Opdam presented a justification of his conduct to the States-General; but by this oversight he forfeited the fruits of a long service, during which he had exhibited repeated proofs of courage, zeal, and capacity: the States honored Schlangenburg with a letter of thanks for the valor and skill he had manifested in this engagement; but in a little time they dismissed him from his employment, on account of his having given umbrage to the duke of Marlborough, by censuring his grace for exposing such a small number of men to this disaster. After this action, Villeroy, who lay encamped near St. Job, declared he would wait for the duke of Marlborough, who forthwith advanced to Hoogstraat, with a view to give him battle; but, at his approach, the French general, setting fire to his camp, retired within his lines with great precipitation: then the duke invested Huy, the garrison of which, after a vigorous defence, surrendered themselves prisoners of war on the twenty-seventh of August. At a council of war held in the camp of the confederates, the duke proposed to attack the enemies' lines between the Mehaigne and Leuwe, and was seconded by the Danish, Hanoverian, and Hessian generals; but the scheme was opposed by the Dutch officers and the deputies of the States, who alleged that the success was dubious, and the consequences of forcing the lines would be inconsiderable; they therefore recommended the siege of Limburg, by the reduction of which they would acquire a whole province, and cover their own country, as well as Juliers and Gueldres, from the designs of the enemy: the siege of Limburg was accordingly undertaken: the trenches were opened on the twenty-fifth of September, and in two days the place was surrendered; the garrison remaining prisoners of war. By this conquest the allies secured the country of Liege and the electorate of Cologne from the incursions of the enemy: before the end of the year, they remained masters of the whole Spanish Guelderland, by the reduction of Gueldres, which surrendered on the seventeenth of September, after having been long blockaded, bombarded, and reduced to a heap of ashes by the Prussian general, Lottum. Such was the campaign in the Netherlands, which in all probability would have produced events of greater importance, had not the duke of Marlborough been restricted by the deputies of the States-General, who began to be influenced by the intrigues of the Louvestein faction, ever averse to a single dictator.

39. The French king redoubled his efforts in Germany: the duke of Vendome was ordered to march from the Milanese to Tyrol, and there join the elector of Bavaria, who had already made himself master of Inspruck: but the boors rising in arms, drove him out of the country before he could be joined by the French general, who was therefore obliged to return to the Milanese. The imperialists in Italy were so ill supplied by the court of Vienna, that they could not pretend to act offensively: the French invested Ostiglia, which however they could not reduce ; but the fortress of Barsillo, in the duchy of Reggio, capitulating after a long blockade, they took possession of the duke of Modena's country. The elector of Bavaria rejoining Villars, resolved to attack count Stirum, whom prince Louis of Baden had detached from his army : with this view, they passed the Danube at Donawert, and discharged six guns, as a signal for the marquis D'Usson, whom they had left in the camp at Lavingen, to fall on the rear of the imperialists, while they should charge them in front. Stirum no sooner perceived the signal, than he guessed the intention of the enemy, and instantly resolved to attack D'Usson before the elector and the marshal should advance : he accordingly charged him at the head of some select squadrons with such impetuosity, that the French cavalry were totally defeated ; and all his infantry would have been killed and taken, had not the elector and Villars come up in time to turn the fate of the day : the action continued from six in the morning till four in the afternoon ; when Stirum, being overpowered by numbers, was obliged to retreat to Nordlingen, with the loss of 12,000 men, and all his baggage and artillery. In the mean time the duke of Burgundy, assisted by Tallard, undertook the siege of Old Brisac with a prodigious train of artillery : the place was very strongly fortified, though the garrison was small, and ill provided with necessaries : in fourteen days the governor surrendered the place, and was condemned to lose his head for having made such a slender defence : the duke of Burgundy returned in triumph to Versailles, and Tallard was ordered to invest Landau : the prince of Hesse-Cassel being detached from the Netherlands for the relief of the place, joined the count of Nassau-Weilburg, general of the palatine forces, near Spire, where they resolved to attack the French in their lines : but by this time Mons. Pracontal, with 10,000 men, had joined Tallard, and enabled him to strike a stroke which proved decisive : he suddenly quitted his lines, and surprised the prince at Spirebach, where the French obtained a complete victory, after a very obstinate and bloody engagement, in which the prince of Hesse distinguished himself by uncommon marks of courage and presence of mind : three horses were successively killed under him, and he slew a French officer with his own hand : after incredible efforts, he was fain to retreat with the loss of some thousands : the French paid dear for their victory, Pracontal having been slain in the action ; nevertheless, they resumed the siege, and the place was surrendered by capitulation. The campaign in Germany was finished with the reduction of Augsburg by the elector of Bavaria, who took it in the month of December, and agreed to its being secured by a French garrison.

40. The emperor's affairs at this juncture wore a very unpromising aspect: the Hungarians were fleeced and barbarously oppressed by those to whom he entrusted the government of their country: they derived courage from despair: they seized this opportunity, when the emperor's forces were divided and his councils distracted, to exert themselves in defence of their liberties: they ran to arms, under the auspices of prince Ragotzki: they demanded that their grievances should be redressed and their privileges restored: their resentment was kept up by the emissaries of France and Bavaria, who likewise encouraged them to persevere in their revolt by repeated promises of protection and assistance. The emperor's prospect, however, was soon mended, by two incidents of very great consequence to his interest: the duke of Savoy, foreseeing how much he should be exposed to the mercy of the French king should that monarch become master of the Milanese, engaged in a secret negociation with the emperor, which, notwithstanding all his caution, was discovered by the court of Versailles: Louis immediately ordered the duke of Vendome to disarm the troops of Savoy that were in his army, to the number of 22,000 men; to insist on the duke's putting him in possession of four considerable fortresses; and demand that the number of his troops should be reduced to the establishment stipulated in the treaty of 1696. The duke, exasperated at these insults, ordered the French ambassador and several officers of the same nation to be arrested: Louis endeavored to intimidate him by a menacing letter, in which he gave him to understand, that since neither religion, honor, interest, nor alliances had been able to influence his conduct, the duke de Vendome should make known the intentions of the French monarch, and allow him four-and-twenty hours to deliberate on the measures he should pursue: this letter was answered by a manifesto: in the mean time, the duke concluded a treaty with the court of Vienna, acknowledged the archduke Charles as king of Spain, and sent envoys to England and Holland. Queen Anne, knowing his importance as well as his selfish disposition, assured him of her friendship and assistance; and both she and the States sent ambassadors to Turin: he was immediately joined by a body of imperial horse under Visconti, and afterwards by count Staremburg, at the head of 15,000 men, with whom that general marched from the Modenese, in the worst season of the year, through an enemy's country, and roads that were deemed impassable: in vain the French forces harassed him in his march, and even surrounded him in many different places on the route: he surmounted all these difficulties with incredible courage and perseverance, and joined the duke of Savoy at Canelli, so as to secure the country of Piedmont. The other incident which proved so favorable to the imperial interest, was a treaty, by which the king of Portugal acceded to the grand alliance: his ministry perceived, that should Spain be once united to the crown of France, their master would sit very insecure on his throne: they were intimidated by the united fleets of the maritime powers, which maintained the empire of the sea; and they were allured by the splendor of a match between their infanta and the archduke Charles, to whom the emperor and king of the Romans promised to transfer all their pretensions to the Spanish crown. By this treaty, concluded at Lisbon, between the emperor, the queen of Great Britain, the king of Portugal, and the States-General, it was stipulated, that king Charles should be conveyed to Portugal by a powerful fleet, having on board 12,000 soldiers, with a great supply of money, arms, and ammunition; and that he should be joined immediately on his landing by an army of 28,000 Portuguese.

41. The confederates reaped very little advantage from the naval operations of this summer: Sir George Rooke cruised in the Channel, in order to alarm the coast of France, and protect the trade of England. On the first of July, Sir Cloudesley Shovel sailed from St. Helens, with the combined squadrons of England and Holland: he directed his course to the Mediterranean; and being reduced to great difficulty by want of water, steered to Altea, on the coast of Valentia, where brigadier Seymour landed, and encamped with 2500 marines: the admiral published a short manifesto, signifying that he was not come to disturb, but to protect the good subjects of Spain, who would swear allegiance to their lawful monarch, the archduke Charles, and endeavor to shake off the yoke of France: this declaration produced little or no effect; and the fleet being watered, Sir Cloudesley sailed to Leghorn. One design of this armament was to assist the Cevennois, who had, in the course of the preceding year, been persecuted into a revolt on account of religion, and implored the assistance of England and the States-General: the admiral detached two ships into the gulf of Narbonne, with some refugees and French pilots, who had concerted signals with the Cevennois; but the marshal de Montrevil, having received intimation of their design, took such measures as prevented all communication; and the English captains having repeated their signals to no purpose, rejoined Sir Cloudesley Shovel at Leghorn. This admiral, having renewed the peace with the piratical states of Barbary, returned to England, without having taken one effectual step for annoying the enemy, or attempted any thing that looked like the result of a concerted scheme for that purpose. The nation naturally murmured at the fruitless expedition, by which it had incurred such a considerable expense: the merchants complained that they were ill supplied with convoys: the ships of war were victualled with damaged provision; and every article of the marine being mismanaged, the blame fell on those who acted as council to the lord high-admiral.

42. Nor were the arms of England by sea much more successful in the West-Indies. Sir George Rooke, in the preceding year, had detached from the Mediterranean captain Hovenden Walker, with six ships of the line and transports, having on board four regiments of soldiers, for the Leeward islands: being joined at Antigua by some troops under colonel Codrington, they made a descent on the island of Guadaloupe, where they rased the fort, burned the town, ravaged the country, and re-embarked with precipitation, in consequence of a report that the French had landed 900 men on the back of the island: they retired to Nevis, where they must have perished by famine, had not they been providentially relieved by vice-admiral Graydon, in his way to Jamaica. This officer had been sent out with three ships to succeed Benbow, and was convoyed about 150 leagues by two other ships of the line: he had not sailed many days, when he fell in with part of the French squadron, commanded by Du Casse, on their return from the West-Indies, very full, and richly laden: captain Cleland, of the Montagu, engaged the sternmost; but he was called off by a signal from the admiral, who proceeded on his voyage, without taking farther notice of the enemy : when he arrived at Jamaica, he quarrelled with the principal planters of the island ; and his ships beginning to be crazy, he resolved to return to England : he accordingly sailed through the gulf of Florida, with a view to attack the French at Placentia, in Newfoundland ; but his ships were dispersed in a fog that lasted thirty days ; and afterwards the council of war which he convoked were of opinion that he could not attack the settlement with any prospect of success : at his return to England, the house of lords, then sitting, set on foot an inquiry into his conduct : they presented an address to the queen, desiring she would remove him from his employments ; and he was accordingly dismissed. The only exploit that tended to distress the enemy was performed by rear-admiral Dilkes, who in the month of July sailed to the coast of France with a small squadron, and in the neighborhood of Granville took or destroyed about forty ships and their convoy : yet this damage was inconsiderable, when compared to that which the English navy sustained from the dreadful tempest that began to blow on the twenty-seventh of November, accompanied with such flashes of lightning and peals of thunder, as overwhelmed the whole kingdom with consternation : the houses in London shook from their foundations ; and some of them falling, buried the inhabitants in their ruins : the water overflowed several streets, and rose to a considerable height in Westminster-hall : London-bridge was almost choked up with the wrecks of vessels that perished in the river : the loss sustained by the capital was computed at £1,000,000 sterling, and the city of Bristol suffered to a prodigious amount ; but the chief national damage fell on the navy : thirteen ships of war were lost, together with 1500 seamen, including rear-admiral Beaumont, who had been employed in observing the Dunkirk squadron, and was then at anchor in the Downs, where his ship foundered : this great loss however was repaired with incredible diligence, to the astonishment of all Europe. The queen immediately issued orders for building a greater number of ships than that which had been destroyed ; and she exercised her bounty for the relief of the shipwrecked seamen, and the widows of those who were drowned, in such a manner as endeared her to all her subjects.

43. The emperor having declared his second son Charles

king of Spain, that young prince set out from Vienna to Holland, and at Dusseldorp was visited by the duke of Marlborough, who in the name of his mistress congratulated him on his accession to the crown of Spain. Charles received him with the most obliging courtesy: in the course of their conversation, taking off his sword, he presented it to the English general, with a very gracious aspect, saying, in the French language, 'I am not ashamed to own myself a poor prince: I possess nothing but my cloak and sword; the latter may be of use to your grace; and I hope you will not think it the worse for my wearing it one day.'—'On the contrary,' replied the duke, 'it will always put me in mind of your majesty's just right and title, and of the obligations I lie under to hazard my life in making you the greatest prince in christendom.' This nobleman returned to England in October; and king Charles embarking for the same kingdom, under convoy of an English and Dutch squadron, arrived at Spithead on the twenty-sixth of December: there he was received by the dukes of Somerset and Marlborough, who conducted him to Windsor; and on the road he was met by prince George of Denmark. The queen's deportment towards him was equally noble and obliging; and he expressed the most profound respect and veneration for this illustrious princess: he spoke but little, yet what he said was judicious; and he behaved with such politeness and affability, as conciliated the affection of the English nobility. After having been magnificently entertained for three days, he returned to Portsmouth, from whence, on the fourth of January, he sailed for Portugal, with a great fleet commanded by Sir George Rooke, having on board a body of land-forces, under the duke of Schomberg: when the admiral had almost reached Cape Finisterre, he was driven back by a storm to Spithead, where he was obliged to remain till the middle of February: then being favored with a fair wind, he happily performed the voyage to Lisbon, where king Charles was received with great splendor, though the court of Portugal was overspread with sorrow, excited by the death of the infanta, whom the king of Spain intended to espouse. In Poland, all hope of peace seemed to vanish: the cardinal-primate, by the instigation of the Swedish king, whose army lay encamped in the neighborhood of Dantzic, assembled a diet at Warsaw, which solemnly deposed Augustus, and declared the throne vacant : their intention was to elect young Sobieski, son of their late monarch, who resided at Breslau, in Silesia ; but their scheme was anticipated by Augustus, who retired hastily into his Saxon dominions ; and seizing Sobieski, with his brother, secured them as prisoners at Dresden.

1. WHEN the parliament met in October, the queen in her speech took notice of the declaration by the duke of Savoy, and the treaty with Portugal, as circumstances advantageous to the alliance: she told them, that although no provision was made for the expedition to Lisbon, and the augmentation of the land forces, the funds had answered so well, and the produce of prizes been so considerable, that the public had not run in debt by those additional services; that she had contributed out of her own revenue to the support of the circle of Suabia, whose firm adherence to the interest of the allies deserved her seasonable assistance: she said, she would not engage in any unnecessary expense of her own, that she might have the more to spare towards the ease of her subjects: she recommended despatch and union, and earnestly exhorted them to avoid any heats or divisions that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and state. Notwithstanding this admonition, and the addresses of both houses, in which they promised to avoid all divisions, a motion was made in the house of commons for renewing the bill against occasional conformity, and carried by a great majority: in the new draft, however, the penalties were lowered, and the severest clauses mitigated: as the court no longer interested itself in the success of this measure, the house was pretty equally divided with respect to the speakers, and the debates on each side were maintained with equal spirit and ability: at length it passed, and was sent up to the lords, who handled it still more severely: it was opposed by a small majority of the bishops, and particularly by Burnet of Sarum, who declaimed against it, as a scheme of the papists to set the church and protestants at variance: it was successively attacked by the duke of Devonshire, the earl of Pembroke, the lords Haversham, Mohun, Ferrars, and Wharton: prince George of Denmark absented himself from the house; and the question being put for a second reading, it was carried in the negative; yet the duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin entered their dissent against its being rejected, though the former had positively declared that he thought the bill unseasonable. The commons, having perused a copy of the treaty with Portugal, voted 40,000 men, including 5000 marines, for the sea service of the ensuing year; and a like number of land forces, to act in conjunction with the allies, besides the additional 10,000: they likewise resolved that the proportion to be employed in Portugal should amount to 8000: sums were granted for the maintenance of these great armaments, as well as for the subsidies payable to her majesty's allies; and funds appointed equal to the occasion: then they assured the queen, in an address, that they would provide for the support of such alliances as she had made or should make with the duke of Savoy.

2. At this period the nation was alarmed by the detection of a conspiracy said to be hatched by the Jacobites of Scotland. Simon Fraser, lord Lovat, a man of desperate enterprise, profound dissimulation, abandoned morals, and ruined fortune, who had been outlawed for having ravished a sister of the marquis of Athol, was the person to whom the plot seems to have owed its origin: he repaired to the court of St. Germain, where he undertook to assemble a body of 12,000 highlanders to act in favor of the pretender, if the court of France would assist them with a small reinforcement of troops, together with officers, arms, ammunition, and money: the French king seemed to listen to the proposal; but, as Fraser's character was infamous, he doubted his veracity: he was therefore sent back to Scotland with two other persons, who were instructed to learn the strength and sentiments of the clans, and endeavor to engage some of the nobility in the design of an insurrection: Fraser no sooner returned, than he privately discovered the whole transaction to the duke of Queensbury, and undertook to make him acquainted with the whole correspondence between the pretender and the Jacobites: in consequence of this service, he was provided with a pass, to secure him from all prosecution; and made a progress through the highlands, to sound the inclination of the chieftains. Before he set out on this circuit, he delivered to the duke a letter from the queen dowager at St. Germain directed to the marquis of Athol: it was couched in general terms, and superscribed in a different character; so that, in all probability, Fraser had forged the direction, with a view to ruin the marquis, who had prosecuted him for the injury done to his sister: he proposed a second journey to France, where he should be able to discover other more material circumstances; and the duke of Queensbury procured a pass for him to go to Holland from the earl of Nottingham, though it was expedited under a borrowed name. The duke had communicated his discovery to the queen, without disclosing his name, which he desired might be concealed: her majesty believed the particulars, which were confirmed by her spies at Paris, as well as by the evidence of Sir John Maclean, who had lately been convoyed from France to England in an open boat, and apprehended at Folkstone: this gentleman pretended at first that his intention was to go through England to his own country, in order to take the benefit of the queen's pardon; and this, in all probability, was his real design; but being given to understand that he would be treated in England as a traitor unless he should merit forgiveness by making important discoveries, he related all he knew of the proposed insurrection: from his informations the ministry gave directions for apprehending one Keith, whose uncle had accompanied Fraser from France, and knew all the intrigues of the court of St. Germain: he declared, that there was no other design on foot, except that of paving the way for the pretender's ascending the throne after the queen's decease. Ferguson, that veteran conspirator, affirmed that Fraser had been employed by the duke of Queensbury to decoy some persons whom he hated into a conspiracy, that he might have an opportunity to effect their ruin; and by the discovery establish his own credit, which began to totter: perhaps there was too much reason for this imputation. Among those who were seized at this time was a gentleman of the name of Lindsay, who had been under-secretary to the earl of Middleton: he had returned from France to Scotland, in order to take the benefit of the queen's pardon, under the shelter of which he came to England, thinking himself secure from prosecution: he protested he knew of no designs against the queen or her government; and that he did not believe she would ever receive the least injury or molestation from the court of St. Germain: the house of lords having received intimation of this conspiracy, resolved, that a committee should be appointed to examine into the particulars; and ordered that Sir John Maclean should be next day brought to their house. The queen, who was far from being pleased with this instance of their officious interposition, gave them to understand by message that she thought it would be inconvenient to change the method of examination already begun; and that she would in a short time inform the house of the whole affair: on the seventeenth of December, the queen went to the house of peers, and having passed the bill for the land-tax, made a speech to both houses, in which she declared that she had unquestionable information of ill practices and designs carried on by the emissaries of France in Scotland: the lords persisting in their resolution to bring the inquiry into their own house, chose their select committee by ballot; and in an address, thanked her majesty for the information she had been pleased to communicate.

3. The commons, taking it for granted that the queen was disobliged at these proceedings of the upper house, which indeed implied an insult on her ministry if not on herself, presented an address, declaring themselves surprised to find, that when persons suspected of treasonable practices were taken into custody by her majesty's messengers, in order to be examined, the lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, had wrested them out of her hands, and arrogated the examination solely to themselves; so that a due inquiry into the evil practices and designs against her majesty's person and government might, in a great measure, be obstructed: they earnestly desired that she would suffer no diminution of the prerogative; and they assured her they would, to the utmost of their power, support her in the exercise of it at home, as well as in asserting it against all invasions whatsoever. The queen thanked them for their concern and assurances; and was not ill pleased at the nature of the address, though the charge against the peers was not strictly true; for there were many instances of their having assumed such a right of inquiry. The upper house deeply resented the accusation: they declared that by the known laws and customs of parliament, they had an undoubted right to take examinations of persons charged with criminal matters, whether those persons were or were not in custody: they resolved that the address of the commons was unparliamentary, groundless, without precedent, highly injurious to the house of peers, tending to interrupt the good correspondence between the two houses, to create an ill opinion in her majesty of the house of peers, of dangerous consequence to the liberties of the people, the constitution of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament: they presented a long remonstrance to the queen, justifying their own conduct, explaining the steps they had taken, recriminating on the commons, and expressing the most fervent zeal, duty, and affection to her majesty: in her answer to this representation, which was drawn up with elegance, propriety, and precision, she professed her sorrow for the misunderstanding which had happened between the two houses of parliament, and thanked them for the concern they had expressed for the rights of the crown and the prerogative, which she should never exert so willingly as for the good of her subjects and the protection of their liberties.

4. Among other persons seized on the coast of Sussex, on their landing from France, was one Boucher, who had been aide-de-camp to the duke of Berwick: this man, when examined, denied all knowlege of any conspiracy: he said, that being weary of living so long abroad, and having made some unsuccessful attempts to obtain a pass, he had chosen rather to cast himself on the queen's mercy than to remain longer in exile from his native country: he was tried and condemned for high-treason, yet continued to declare himself ignorant of the plot: he proved, that in the war of Ireland, as well as in Flanders, he had treated the English prisoners with great humanity: the lords desisted from the prosecution; he obtained a reprieve, and died in Newgate. On the twenty-ninth of January the earl of Nottingham told the house, that the queen had commanded him to lay before them the papers containing all the particulars hitherto discovered of the conspiracy in Scotland; but that there was one circumstance which could not yet be properly communicated, without running the risk of preventing a discovery of greater importance: they forthwith drew up and presented an address, desiring that all the papers might be immediately submitted to their inspection: the queen said she did not expect to be pressed in this manner immediately after the declaration she had made; but in a few days the earl of Nottingham delivered the papers sealed to the house, and all the lords were summoned to attend on the eighth of February, that they might be opened and perused: Nottingham was suspected of a design to stifle the conspiracy: complaint was made in the house of commons, that he had discharged an officer belonging to the late king James, who had been seized by the governor of Berwick: a warm debate ensued, and at length ended in a resolve, that the earl of Nottingham, one of her majesty's principal secretaries of state, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unquestionable fidelity to the queen and her government, and for his steady adherence to the church of England as by law established, highly merited the trust her majesty had reposed in him: they ordered the speaker to present this resolution to the queen, who said she was glad to find them so well satisfied with the earl of Nottingham, who was trusted by her in so considerable an office: they perused the examinations of the witnesses which were laid before them, without passing judgment, or offering advice on the subject; but they thanked her majesty for having communicated those particulars, as well as for her wisdom and care of the nation. While the lords proceeded with uncommon eagerness in their inquiry, the lower house, in another address, renewed their complaints against the conduct of the peers, which they still affirmed was without a precedent: but this was the language of irritated faction, by which indeed both sides were equally actuated.

5. The select committee of the lords prosecuted the inquiry, and founded their report chiefly on the confession of Sir John Maclean, who owned that the court of St. Germain's had listened to Lovat's proposal; that several councils had been held at the pretender's court on the subject of an invasion; and that persons were sent over to sound some of the nobility in Scotland: but the nature of their private correspondence and negotiation could not be discovered: Keith had tampered with his uncle to disclose the whole secret; and this was the circumstance which the queen declined imparting to the lords, until she should know the success of his endeavors, which proved ineffectual: the uncle stood aloof; and the ministry did not heartily engage in the inquiry. The house of lords having finished these examinations, and being warmed with violent debates, voted, that there had been dangerous plots between some persons in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germain's; and, that the encouragement for this plotting arose from the not settling the succession to the crown of Scotland in the house of Hanover: these votes were signified to the queen in an address; and they promised, that when the succession should be thus settled, they would endeavor to promote the union of the two kingdoms on just and reasonable terms: then they composed another representation, in answer to the second address of the commons touching their proceedings: they charged the lower house with want of zeal in the whole progress of this inquiry: they produced a great number of precedents, to prove that their conduct had been regular and parliamentary; and they, in their turn, accused the commons of partiality and injustice in vacating legal elections. The queen, in answer to this remonstrance, said she looked on any misunderstanding between the two houses as a very great misfortune to the kingdom; and that she should never omit any thing in her power to prevent all occasions of them for the future.

6. The lords and commons, animated by such opposite principles, seized every opportunity of thwarting each other. An action having been brought by one Matthew Ashby against William White, and the other constables of Aylesbury, for having denied him the privilege of voting in the last election, the cause was tried at the assizes, and the constables were cast with damages; but an order was given in the queen's-bench to quash all the proceedings, since no action had ever been brought on that account: the cause being moved by writ of error into the house of lords, was argued with great warmth: at length it was carried by a great majority, that the order of the queen's-bench should be set aside, and judgment pronounced according to the verdict given at the assizes. The commons considered these proceedings as encroaching on their privileges: they passed five different resolutions, importing that the commons of England in parliament assembled had the sole right to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of election of their own members; that the practice of determining the qualifications of electors in any court of law would expose all mayors, bailiffs, and returning officers to a multiplicity of vexatious suits and insupportable expenses, and subject them to different and independent jurisdictions, as well as to inconsistent determinations in the same case, without relief: that Matthew Ashby was guilty of a breach of privilege, as were all attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, and sergeants at law, soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading in any case of the same nature. These resolutions, signed by the clerk, were fixed on the gate of Westminster-hall: on the other hand, the lords appointed a committee to draw up a state of the case; and, on their report, resolved, that every person being wilfully hindered to exercise his right of voting, might maintain an action in the queen's courts against the officer by whom his vote should be refused, to assert his right, and recover damages for the injury : that an assertion to the contrary was destructive of the property of the subjects, against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tended to the encouragement of partiality and corruption : that the declaring of Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the house of commons was an unprecedented attempt on the judicature of parliament, and an attempt to subject the law of England to the votes of the house of commons : copies of the case, and these resolutions, were sent by the lord keeper to all the sheriffs of England, to be circulated through all the boroughs of their respective counties.

7. On the seventh of February, the queen ordered secretary Hedges to tell the house of commons that she had remitted the arrears of the tenths to the poor clergy ; that she would grant her whole revenue arising out of the first-fruits and tenths, as far as it should become free from encumbrance, as an augmentation of their maintenance ; that if the house of commons could find any method by which her intentions to the poor clergy might be made more effectual, it would be an advantage to the public, and acceptable to her majesty : the commons immediately brought in a bill, enabling her to alienate this branch of the revenue, and create a corporation by charter, to direct the application of it to the uses proposed : they likewise repealed the statute of mortmain, so far as to allow all men to bequeathe by will or grant by deed any sum they should think fit to give towards the augmentation of benefices. Addresses of thanks and acknowledgement from all the clergy of England were presented to the queen for her gracious bounty ; but very little regard was paid to Burnet, bishop of Sarum, although the queen declared that prelate author of the project : he was generally hated, either as a Scot, a low-churchman, or a meddling partisan.

8. In March an inquiry into the condition of the navy was begun in the house of lords : they desired the queen, in an address, to give speedy and effectual orders that a number of ships sufficient for the home service should be equipped and manned with all possible expedition : they resolved, that admiral Graydon's not attacking the four French ships in the channel had been a prejudice to the queen's service, and a disgrace to the nation ; that his pressing men in Jamaica, and his severity towards masters of merchant vessels and transports, had been a great discouragement to the inhabitants of that island, as well as prejudicial to her majesty's service; and they presented an address against him, in consequence of which he was dismissed: they examined the accounts of the earl of Orford, against which great clamor had been raised; and taking cognisance of the remarks made by the commissioners of the public accounts, found them false in fact, ill-grounded, and of no importance: the commons besought the queen to order a prosecution on account of ill practices in the earl of Ranelagh's office; and they sent up to the lords a bill for continuing the commission on the public accounts: some alterations were made in the upper house, especially in the nomination of commissioners; but these were rejected by the commons: the peers adhering to their amendments, the bill dropped, and the commission expired: no other bill of any consequence passed in this session, except an act for raising recruits, which empowered justices of the peace to impress idle persons for soldiers and marines. On the third of April the queen went to the house of peers, and having made a short speech on the usual topics of acknowledgement, unity, and moderation, prorogued the parliament to the fourth of July. The division still continued between the two houses of convocation; so that nothing of moment was transacted in that assembly, except their address to the queen on her granting the first-fruits and tenths for the augmentation of small benefices: at the same time, the lower house sent their prolocutor with a deputation to wait on the speaker of the house of commons, to return their thanks to that honorable house for having espoused the interest of the clergy; and to assure them that the convocation would pursue such methods as might best conduce to the support, honor, interest, and security of the church as now by law established: they sent up to the archbishop and prelates divers representations, containing complaints, and proposing canons and articles of reformation; but very little regard was paid to their remonstrances.

9. About this period the earl of Nottingham, after having ineffectually pressed the queen to discard the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, resigned the seals: the earl of Jersey and Sir Edward Seymour were dismissed; the earl of Kent was appointed chamberlain, Harley secretary of state, and Henry St. John secretary of war. The discovery of the Scottish conspiracy was no sooner known in France, than Louis ordered Fraser to be imprisoned in the Bastile:

in England, Lindsay being sentenced to die for having corresponded with France, was given to understand that he had no mercy to expect, unless he would discover the conspiracy: he persisted in denying all knowledge of any such conspiracy, and scorned to save his life by giving false information: in order to intimidate him into a confession, the ministry ordered him to be conveyed to Tyburn, where he still rejected life on the terms proposed: then he was carried back to Newgate, where he remained some years; at length he was banished, and died of hunger in Holland. The ministers had been so lukewarm and languid in the investigation of the Scottish conspiracy, that the whigs loudly exclaimed against them as disguised Jacobites, and even whispered insinuations, implying that the queen herself had a secret bias of sisterly affection for the court of St. Germain: what seemed to confirm this allegation, was the disgrace of the duke of Queensbury, who had exerted himself with remarkable zeal in the detection; but the decline of his interest in Scotland was the real cause of his being laid aside at this juncture.

10. The design of the court was to procure in the Scottish parliament the nomination of a successor to the crown, and a supply for the forces, which could not be obtained in the preceding session: secretary Johnston, in concert with the marquis of Tweedale, undertook to carry these points, in return for certain limitations on the successor, to which her majesty agreed: <sup>1</sup> the marquis was appointed commissioner; the office of lord-register was bestowed on Johnston; and the parliament met on the sixth of July. The queen, in her letter, [1704.] expressed her concern that these divisions should have risen to such a height, as to encourage the enemies of the nation to employ their emissaries for debauching her good subjects from their allegiance: she declared her resolution to grant whatever could in reason be demanded for quieting the minds of the people: she told them, she had empowered the marquis of Tweedale to give unquestionable proofs of her determination to maintain the government in church and state as by law established in that kingdom; to consent to such laws as should be found wanting for the farther security of both, and for preventing all encroachments for the future: she earnestly exhorted them to settle the succession in the protestant line, as a step absolutely necessary for their own peace and happiness, the quiet and security of all her dominions, the reputation of her affairs abroad, and the improvement of the protestant interest through all Europe: she declared, that she had authorised the commissioners to give the royal assent to whatever could be reasonably demanded, and was in her power to grant, for securing the sovereignty and liberties of that her ancient kingdom: the remaining part of the letter turned on the necessity of their granting a supply, the discouragement of vice, the encouragement of commerce, and the usual recommendation of moderation and unanimity.

11. The duke of Hamilton presented a resolve, that the parliament would not name a successor to the crown, until the Scots should have concluded a previous treaty with England, in relation to commerce and other concerns: this motion produced a warm debate, in the course of which Fletcher of Saltoun expatiated on the hardships and miseries which the Scots had sustained since the union of the two crowns under one sovereign, and the impossibility of bettering their condition, unless they should take care to anticipate any design that tended to a continuation of the same calamities: another resolve was produced by the earl of Rothes, importing that the parliament should proceed to make such limitations and conditions of the government as might be judged proper for rectifying the constitution; for vindicating and securing the sovereignty and independence of the nation; and that then parliament would take into consideration the other resolve offered by the duke of Hamilton for a treaty previous to the nomination of a successor. This proposal was seconded by the court party, and violent heats ensued: at length, Sir James Falconer, of Phesdo, offered an expedient, which neither party could refuse with any show of moderation: he suggested a resolve, that the parliament would not proceed to the nomination of a successor until the previous treaty with England should be discussed; and that it would make the necessary limitations and conditions of government, before the successor should be nominated: this joint resolve, being put to the vote, was carried by a great majority: the treaty with England was neglected, and the affair of the succession consequently postponed. The duke of Athol moved that her majesty should be desired to send down the witnesses and all the papers relating to the conspiracy; that, after due examination, those who were unjustly accused might be vindicated, and the guilty punished according to their demerits: the commissioner declared, that he had already written, and would write again to the queen on that subject: the intention of the cavaliers was to convict the duke of Queensbury of malice and calumny in the prosecution of that affair, that they might wreak their vengeance on him for that instance of his animosity, as well as for his having deserted them in the former session: he found means, however, to persuade the queen, that such an inquiry would not only protract the session, but also divert them from the settlement of the succession, and raise such a ferment as might be productive of tragical consequences: alarmed at these suggestions, she resolved to prevent the examination, and gave no answer to the repeated applications made by her parliament and ministers: meanwhile the duke of Queensbury appeased his enemies in Scotland, by directing all his friends to join in the opposition.

12. The duke of Hamilton again moved, that the parliament should proceed to the limitations, and name commissioners to treat with England, previous to all other business, except an act for a land-tax of two months, necessary for the immediate subsistence of the forces: the earl of Marchmont proposed an act to exclude all popish successors; but this was warmly opposed, as unseasonable, by Hamilton and his party: a bill of supply being offered by the lord justice Clerk, the cavaliers tacked to it great part of the act of security, to which the royal assent had been refused in the former session: violent debates arose; so that the house was filled with rage and tumult. The national spirit of independence had been wrought up to a dangerous pitch of enthusiasm: the streets were crowded with people of all ranks, exclaiming against English influence; and threatening to sacrifice as traitors to their country all who should embrace measures that seemed to favor a foreign interest: the commissioner and his friends were confounded and appalled: finding it impossible to stem the torrent, he, with the concurrence of the other ministers, wrote a letter to the queen, representing the uncomfortable situation of affairs, and advising her majesty to pass the bill, encumbered as it was with the act of security. Lord Godolphin, on whose counsel she chiefly relied, found himself involved in great perplexity: the tories had devoted him to destruction: he foresaw that the queen's concession to the Scots in an affair of such consequence would furnish his enemies with a plausible pretence to arraign the conduct of her minister; but he chose to run that risk, rather than see the army disbanded for want of a supply, and the kingdom left exposed to an invasion: he therefore seconded the advice of the Scottish ministers; and the queen authorised the commissioner to pass the bill that was depending. The act provided, that in case of the queen's dying without issue, a parliament should immediately meet, and declare the successor to the crown, different from the person possessing the throne of England, unless before that period a settlement should be made in parliament of the rights and liberties of the nation, independent of English councils; by another clause, they were empowered to arm and train the subjects, so as to put them in a posture of defence. The Scottish parliament, having, by a laudable exertion of spirit, obtained this act of security, granted the supply without farther hesitation; but, not yet satisfied with this sacrifice, they engaged in debates about the conspiracy, and the proceedings of the house of lords in England, which they termed an officious intermeddling in their concerns, and an encroachment on the sovereignty and independence of the nation: they drew up an address to the queen, desiring that the evidence and papers relating to the plot might be subjected to their examination in the next session: meanwhile, the commissioner, dreading the farther progress of such an ungovernable ferocity, prorogued the parliament to the seventh of October. The act of security being transmitted to England, copies of it were circulated by the enemies of Godolphin, who represented it as a measure of that minister; and the kingdom was filled with murmurs and discontent: people openly declared, that the two kingdoms were now separated by law, so as never to be re-joined: reports were spread, that great quantities of arms had been conveyed to Scotland, and that the natives were employed in preparations to invade England: all the blame of these transactions was imputed to lord Godolphin, whom the tories determined to attack; while the other party resolved to exert their whole influence for his preservation: yet, in all probability, he owed his immediate support to the success of his friend the duke of Marlborough.

13. Nothing could be more deplorable than the situation to which the emperor was reduced in the beginning of the season: the malcontents in Hungary had rendered themselves formidable by their success: the elector of Bavaria possessed all the places on the Danube as far as Passau, and even threatened the city of Vienna, which must have been infallibly lost had the Hungarians and Bavarians acted in concert. By the advice of prince Eugene, the emperor implored the assistance of her Britannic majesty; and the duke of Marlborough explained to her the necessity of undertaking his relief. This nobleman, in the month of January, had crossed the sea to Holland, and concerted a scheme with the deputies of the States-General for the operations of the ensuing campaign: they agreed, that general Auverquerque should lie on the defensive with a small body of troops in the Netherlands; while the main army of the allies should act on the Rhine, under the command of the duke of Marlborough: such was the pretext under which this consummate general concealed another plan, which was communicated to a few only, in whose discretion he could confide: it was approved by the pensionary and some leading men, who secured its favorable reception with the States-General, when it became necessary to impart the secret to that numerous assembly: in the mean time, the preparations were made, on pretence of carrying the war to the banks of the Moselle.

14. In the month of April, the duke, accompanied by his brother general Churchill, lieutenant-general Lumley, the earl of Orkney, and other officers of distinction, embarked for Holland, where he had a long conference with a deputation of the States, concerning a proposal of sending a large army towards the Moselle: the deputies of Zealand opposed this measure of sending their troops to such a distance so strenuously, that the duke was obliged to tell them in plain terms he had received orders to march thither with the British forces: he accordingly assembled his army at Maestricht; and on the eighth of May began his march into Germany: the French imagined his intention was to begin the campaign with the siege of Traerbach, and penetrate into France along the Moselle: in this persuasion they sent a detachment to that river; and gave out that they intended to invest Huy, a pretence to which the duke paid no regard: he continued his route by Bedburg, Kerpenord, Kalsecken; he visited the fortifications of Bonne, where he received certain advice that the recruits and reinforcements for the French army in Bavaria had joined the elector at Villengen: he redoubled his diligence, passed the Neckar on the third of June, and halted at Ladenburg : from thence he wrote a letter to the States-General, giving them to understand that he had the queen's orders to march to the relief of the empire, and expressing his hope that they would approve the design, and allow their troops to share the honor of the expedition : by the return of a courier he received their approbation, and full power to command their forces : he then proceeded to Mildenheim, where he was visited by prince Eugene ; and these two great men, whose talents were congenial, immediately contracted an intimacy of friendship : next day prince Louis of Baden arrived in the camp at Great Hippach : he told the duke, his grace was come to save the empire, and to give him an opportunity of vindicating his honor, which he knew was at the last stake in the opinion of some people : the duke replied, he was come to learn of him how to serve the empire ; that they must be ignorant indeed, who did not know that the prince of Baden, when his health permitted him, had preserved the empire, and extended its conquests.

15. Those three celebrated generals agreed that the two armies should join ; that the command should be alternately vested in the duke and prince Louis from day to day ; and that prince Eugene should command a separate army on the Rhine. Prince Louis returned to his army on the Danube ; prince Eugene set out for Philipsburg ; the duke of Marlborough, being joined by the imperial army under prince Louis of Baden at Wastertellen, prosecuted his march by Elchingen, Gingen, and Landthausen : on the first of July he was in sight of the enemy's intrenchments at Dillengen, and encamped with his right at Amerdighem, and his left at Onderingen : understanding that the elector of Bavaria had detached the best part of his infantry to reinforce the count D'Arco, who was posted behind strong lines at Schellenburg near Donawert, he resolved to attack their intrenchments without delay : on the second of July he advanced towards the enemy, and passed the river Wermitz : about five o'clock in the afternoon the attack was begun by the English and Dutch infantry, supported by the horse and dragoons : they were very severely handled, and even obliged to give way ; when prince Louis of Baden marching up, at the head of the imperialists, to another part of the line, made a diversion in their favor : after an obstinate resistance they forced the intrenchments ; and the horse entering with the infantry, fell so furiously on the enemy, already disordered, that they were routed with great slaughter : they fled with the utmost trepidation to Donawert and the Danube, leaving 6000 men dead on the field of battle. The confederates took sixteen pieces of cannon, thirteen pair of colors, with all the tents and baggage : yet the victory was dearly purchased ; some thousands of the allies were slain in the attack, including many gallant officers, among whom were the generals Goor and Beinheim, and count Stirum was mortally wounded : next day the Bavarian garrison abandoned Donawert, of which the confederates took immediate possession ; while the elector passed the Danube in his march to the river Lech, lest the victors should cut off his retreat to his own country. The confederates, having crossed the Danube on several bridges of pontoons, a detachment was sent to pass the Lech, and take post in the country of the elector, who had retired under the cannon of Augsburg : the garrison of Neuburg retiring to Ingoldstadt, the place was secured by the confederates ; and the count de Frize was detached with nine battalions and fifteen squadrons to invest the town of Rain. Advice arriving from prince Eugene, that the marshals Villeroy and Tallard had passed the Rhine at Fort Kehl, with an army of 45,000 men, to succor the elector of Bavaria, the generals of the allies immediately detached prince Maximilian of Hanover with thirty squadrons of horse, as a reinforcement to the prince : in a few days Rain surrendered, and Aicha was taken by assault. The emperor no sooner received a confirmation of the victory of Schellenburg, than he wrote a letter of acknowledgement to the duke of Marlborough, and ordered count Wratislau to intimate his intention of investing him with the title of prince of the empire, which the duke declined accepting, until the queen interposed her authority at the desire of Leopold.

16. The allies advanced within a league of Augsburg, and though they found the elector of Bavaria too securely posted under the cannon of that city to be dislodged or attacked with any prospect of success, they encamped with Friedburg in their centre, so as to cut off all communication between him and his dominions : the duke of Marlborough having reduced him to this situation, proposed very advantageous terms of peace, provided he would abandon the French interest, and join the imperialists in Italy : his subjects, seeing themselves at the mercy of the allies, pressed him to comply with these offers, rather than expose his country to ruin and desolation : a negotiation was begun, and he seemed ready to sign the articles ; when hearing that marshal Tallard had passed the Black Forest, to join him with a great body of forces, he declared, that since the king of France had made such powerful efforts to support him, he thought himself obliged in honor to continue firm in the alliance. The generals of the allies were so exasperated at this disappointment, that they sent out detachments to ravage the country of Bavaria, as far as Munich : upwards of 300 towns, villages, and castles were inhumanly destroyed, to the indelible disgrace of those who countenanced and conducted such barbarous practices : the elector, shocked at these brutal proceedings, desired, in a letter to the duke of Marlborough, that a stop might be put to acts of violence so opposite to true glory : the answer he received implied that it was in his own power to put an end to them by a speedy accommodation : incensed at this reply, he declared, that since they had obliged him to draw the sword, he would throw away the scabbard. The duke and prince Louis, finding it impracticable to attack the elector in his strong camp, resolved to undertake the siege of Ingoldstadt, and for that purpose passed the Paer, near the town of Schrobenhausen, where they encamped, with their left at Closterburg : on the fifth of August the elector of Bavaria marched to Biberach, where he was joined by Tallard : he resolved to pass the Danube at Lawingen ; to attack prince Eugene, who had followed the French army from the lines of Bichi ; and lay encamped at Hochstadt : next day, however, he made a motion that disappointed the enemy : nevertheless, they persisted in their design of passing the Danube, and encamping at Blenheim. The allies resolved that prince Louis should undertake the siege of Ingoldstadt, whilst prince Eugene and the duke should observe the elector of Bavaria : advice being received that he had actually crossed the Danube at Lawingen, the duke of Marlborough joined the forces of prince Eugene at the camp of Munster on the eleventh of August, prince Louis having by this time marched off towards the place he intended to besiege : next day the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene observed the posture of the enemy, who were advantageously posted on a hill near Hochstadt, their right being covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim, their left by the village of Lutzingen, and their front by a rivulet, the banks of which were steep and the bottom marshy.

17. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the generals resolved to attack them immediately, rather than lie inactive until their forage and provision should be consumed : they were moreover stimulated to this hazardous enterprise by an intercepted letter to the elector of Bavaria from marshal Villeroy, giving him to understand that he had received orders to ravage the country of Wirtemberg, and intercept all communication between the Rhine and the allied army. The dispositions being made for the attack, and the orders communicated to the general officers, the forces advanced into the plain on the thirteenth of August, and were ranged in order of battle : the cannonading began about nine in the morning, and continued on both sides till one in the afternoon : the French and Bavarians amounted to about 60,000 men : marshal Tallard commanded on the right, and posted seven and twenty battalions, with twelve squadrons, in the village of Blenheim, supposing that there the allies would make their chief effort : their left was conducted by the elector of Bavaria, assisted by Marsin, a French general of experience and capacity : the number of the confederates did not exceed five and fifty : their right was under the direction of prince Eugene, and their left commanded by the duke of Marlborough. At noon the action was begun by a body of English and Hessians under major-general Wilkes, who having passed the rivulet with difficulty, and filed off to the left in the face of the enemy, attacked the village of Blenheim with great vigor, but were repulsed after three successive attempts : meanwhile the troops in the centre, and part of the right wing, passed the rivulet on planks in different places, and formed on the other side without any molestation from the enemy : at length, however, they were charged by the French horse with such impetuosity, and so terribly galled in flank by the troops posted at Blenheim, that they fell in disorder, and part of them repassed the rivulet ; but a reinforcement of dragoons coming up, the French cavalry were broken in their turn, and driven to the very edges of the village of Blenheim : the left wing of the confederates being now completely formed, ascended the hill in a firm compacted body, charging the enemy's horse, which could no longer stand their ground, but rallied several times as they gave way. Tallard, in order to make a vigorous effort, ordered ten battalions to fill up the intervals of his cavalry : the duke, perceiving his design, sent three battalions of the troops of Zell to sustain his horse : nevertheless, the line was a little disordered by the prodigious fire from the French infantry, and even obliged to recoil about sixty paces; but the confederates advancing to the charge with redoubled ardor, routed the French horse; and their battalions being thus abandoned, were cut in pieces. Tallard, having rallied his broken cavalry behind some tents that were still standing, resolved to draw off the troops he had posted in the village of Blenheim, and sent an aide-de-camp to Marsin, who was with the elector of Bavaria on the left, to desire he would face the confederates with some troops to the right of the village of Oberklau, so as to keep them in play, and favor the retreat of the forces from Blenheim: that officer assured him, he was so far from being in a condition to spare troops, that he could hardly maintain his ground. The fate of the day was now more than half decided: the French cavalry, being vigorously attacked in flank, were totally defeated: part of them endeavored to gain the bridge which they had thrown over the Danube between Hochstadt and Blenheim; but they were so closely pursued, that those who escaped the slaughter threw themselves into the river, where they perished: Tallard, being surrounded, was taken near a mill behind the village of Sonderen, together with the marquis de Montperouz, general of horse, the major-generals de Seppeville, de Silly, de la Valière, and many other officers of distinction. Whilst these occurrences passed on the left wing, Marsin's quarters at the village of Oberklau, in the centre, were attacked by ten battalions, under the prince of Holstein-beck, who passed the rivulet with undaunted resolution; but, before he could form his men on the other side, he was overpowered by numbers, mortally wounded, and taken prisoner: his battalions, being supported by some Danish and Hanoverian cavalry, renewed the charge, and were again repulsed: at length the duke of Marlborough in person brought up some fresh squadrons from the body of reserve, and compelled the enemy to retire. By this time prince Eugene had obliged the left wing of the enemy to give ground, after having surmounted a great number of difficulties, sustained a very obstinate opposition, and seen his cavalry, in which his chief strength seemed to lie, three times repulsed: the duke of Marlborough had no sooner defeated the right wing, than he made a disposition to reinforce the prince, when he understood from an aide-de-camp that his highness had no occasion for assistance; and that the elector, with Monsieur de Marsin, had abandoned Oberklau and Luttingen: they were pursued as far as the villages of Morselingen and Teissenhoven, from whence they retreated to Dillingen and Lawingen. The confederates being now masters of the field of battle, surrounded the village of Blenheim, in which, as we have already observed, seven-and-twenty battalions and twelve squadrons were posted: these troops, seeing themselves cut off from all communication with the rest of their army, and despairing of being able to force their way through the allies, capitulated about eight in the evening, laid down their arms, delivered their colors and standards, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on condition that the officers should not be rifled. This was one of the most glorious and complete victories that ever was obtained: 10,000 French and Bavarians were left dead on the field of battle; the greater part of thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons perished in the river Danube; 13,000 were made prisoners; 100 pieces of cannon were taken, with twenty-four mortars, 129 colors, 171 standards, seventeen pair of kettle-drums, 3600 tents, four-and-thirty coaches, 300 laden mules, two bridges of boats, fifteen pontoons, fifteen barrels, and eight casks filled with silver: of the allies, about 4500 men were killed, and about 8000 wounded or taken. The loss of the battle was imputed to two capital errors committed by marshal Tallard; namely, his weakening the centre, by detaching such a number of troops to the village of Blenheim, and his suffering the confederates to pass the rivulet, and form unmolested: certain it is, these circumstances contributed to the success of the duke of Marlborough, who rode through the hottest of the fire with the calmest intrepidity, giving his orders with that presence of mind and deliberation which were so peculiar to his character: when he next day visited Tallard, he told that general, he was sorry such a misfortune should happen personally to one for whom he had a profound esteem: the marshal congratulated him on having vanquished the best troops in the world; a compliment, to which the duke replied, that he thought his own the best troops in the world, seeing they had conquered those, on whom the marshal had bestowed such an encomium.

18. The victorious generals having by this decisive stroke saved the house of Austria from intire ruin, and intirely changed the face of affairs in the empire, signified their opinion to prince Louis of Baden, that it would be for the advantage of the common cause to join all their forces, and drive the French out of Germany, rather than lose time at the siege of Ingoldstadt, which would surrender of course : this opinion was confirmed by the conduct of the French garrison at Augsburg, who quitted that place on the sixteenth of August : the magistrates sent a deputation, craving the protection of the duke of Marlborough, who forthwith ordered a detachment to take possession of that important city. The duke, having sent marshal de Tallard under a guard of dragoons to Frankfort, and disposed of the other prisoners of distinction in the adjacent places, encamped at Seffingen, within half a league of Ulm ; here he held a conference with the princes Eugene and Louis of Baden, in which they agreed, that, as the enemy retreated towards the Rhine, the confederate army should take the same route, excepting three-and-twenty battalions and some squadrons, to be left for the siege of Ulm, under general Thungen : they began their march on the twenty-sixth of August, by different routes, to the general rendezvous at Bruschal, near Philipsburg : then they resolved that prince Louis of Baden should undertake the siege of Landau, in order to secure the circle of Suabia from the incursions of that garrison. Considering the consternation that prevailed all over France, nothing could be more impolitic than this measure, which gave the enemy time for recollection, and recruiting their forces : it was a proposal on which the prince of Baden insisted with uncommon obstinacy : he was even suspected of corruption : he was jealous of the glory which the duke of Marlborough had acquired ; and such a bigoted papist, that he repined at the success of an heretical general : on the twelfth of September he marched towards Landau with the troops destined for the siege, and the duke of Marlborough, with prince Eugene, encamped at Croon-Weissenburg, to cover the enterprise. By this time Ulm had surrendered to Thungen, even before the trenches were opened : Villeroy advanced with his army towards Landau, as if he had intended to attack the confederates ; but retired without having made any attempt for the relief of the place, which was defended with the most obstinate valor till the twenty-third of November, when the besiegers, having lodged themselves on the counterscarp, the breaches being practicable, and the dispositions made for a general assault, the garrison capitulated on honorable conditions : the king of the Romans had arrived in the camp, that he might have the credit of taking the place, the command of which he bestowed on the count de Frize, who had before defended it with equal courage and ability.

19. The next enterprise which the confederates undertook, was the siege of Traerbach : the hereditary prince of Hesse-Cassel being entrusted with the direction of the attacks, invested the castle in the beginning of November : though it was strongly fortified and well defended, he carried on his operations with such spirit and assiduity, that in about six weeks the garrison surrendered the place on honorable terms. In the mean time the duke of Marlborough repaired to Berlin, where he negotiated for a reinforcement of 8000 Prussians, to serve under prince Eugene in Italy during the next campaign : thence he proceeded to the court of Hanover, where, as in all other places, he was received with particular marks of distinction : when he arrived at the Hague, he was congratulated by the States-General on his victories at Schellenburg and Blenheim, and as much considered in Holland as if he had been actually stadtholder : he had received a second letter from the emperor, couched in the warmest terms of acknowledgement, and was declared prince of the empire : in December he embarked for England, where he found the people in a transport of joy ; and was welcomed as a hero who had retrieved the glory of the nation.

20. In Flanders nothing of moment was executed, except the bombardment of Bruges and Namur by baron Spaar, with 9000 Dutch troops ; and two attempts on the French lines, which were actually penetrated by Auverquerque, though he was not able to maintain the footing he had gained. The elector of Bavaria, who had retired to Brussels after his defeat, formed a scheme for surprising the Dutch general at the end of the campaign, and assembled all his troops at Tirlemont ; but the French court, apprehensive of his temerity, sent Villeroy to watch his conduct, and prevent his hazarding an engagement, except with a fair prospect of advantage : the marshal, finding him determined to give battle at all events, represented the improbability of succeeding against an enemy so advantageously posted, and the ill consequences of a repulse ; but, finding the elector deaf to all his remonstrances, he flatly refused to march, and produced the king's order to avoid an engagement. In Italy the French met with no opposition : the duke of Savoy, being unable to face the enemy in the field, was obliged to lie inactive : he saw the duke de Vendome reduce

Vercelli and Ivrea, and undertake the siege of Verac; while he posted his little army on the other side of the Po, at Crescentino, where he had a bridge of communication, by which he supplied the place occasionally with fresh troops and provisions: the place held out five months against all the efforts of the French general; at length the communication being cut off, the duke of Savoy retired to Chivas: he bore his misfortunes with great equanimity, and told the English minister that though he was abandoned by the allies, he would never abandon himself. The emperor had neglected Italy, that he might act with more vigor against Ragotski and the Hungarian malcontents, over whom he obtained several advantages; notwithstanding which they continued formidable from their number, bravery, and resolution: the ministers of the allies pressed Leopold to enter into a negociation for a peace with those rebels, and conferences were opened; but he was not sincerely disposed to an accommodation, and Ragotski aimed at the principality of Transylvania, which the court of Vienna would not easily relinquish: the emperor was not a little alarmed by a revolution at the Ottoman Porte, until the new sultan despatched a chiaus to Vienna, with an assurance that he would give no assistance to the malcontents of Hungary. In Poland, the diet being assembled by the cardinal-primate, Stanislaus Lezinski, palatine of Posnania, was elected and proclaimed king, and recognised by Charles of Sweden, who still maintained his army by contributions in that country, more intent on the ruin of Augustus than on the preservation of his own dominions; for he paid no regard to the progress of the Muscovites, who had ravaged Livonia, reduced Narva, and made incursions into Sweden: Augustus retreated into his Saxon dominions, which he impoverished, in order to raise a great army, with which he might return to Poland; the pope espoused the interest of this new convert, so far as to cite the cardinal-primate to appear at Rome, and give an account of the share he had in the Polish troubles. The protestants, of the Convennois, deriving courage from despair, became so troublesome to the government of France, that Louis was obliged to treat them with lenity: he sent marshal Villars against them with a fresh reinforcement; but at the same time furnished him with instructions to treat for an accommodation: this officer immediately commenced a negociation with Cavalier, the chief of the revolvers; and a formal treaty was concluded, by which they were indulged with liberty of conscience; but these articles were very ill observed by the French ministry.

21. In Portugal the interest of king Charles wore a very melancholy aspect: when he arrived at Lisbon, he found no preparations made for opening the campaign: the Portuguese ministry favored the French in secret; the people were averse to heretics; the duke of Schomberg was on ill terms with Fagel, the Dutch general; the Portuguese forces consisted of raw undisciplined peasants, and the French ambassador had bought up the best horses in the kingdom; so that the troopers could not be properly mounted: the king of Portugal had promised to enter Spain with Charles by the middle of May; but he was not ready till the beginning of June, when they reached Santarem: by this time they had published their respective manifestos; Charles displaying his title to the crown of Spain, and promising pardon to all his subjects who would in three months join his army; and the king of Portugal declaring that his sole aim in taking up arms was to restore the liberty of the Spanish nation, oppressed by the power of France, as well as to assert the right of Charles to that monarchy. The present possessor, whom they mentioned by the name of the duke of Anjou, had already anticipated their invasion: his general, the duke of Berwick, entering Portugal, took the town of Segura by stratagem: the governor of Salva-terra surrendered at discretion; Cebreros was reduced without much opposition; Zebredo was abandoned by the inhabitants; and the town of Lhana la Viella was taken by assault: Portugal was at the same time invaded in different parts by the marquis de Jeoffreville, prince Tserclaes de Tilly, and the marquis de Villadarias: two Dutch battalions were attacked and taken by the duke of Berwick at Sodreira Formosa: then he passed the Tagus, and joined prince Tserclaes. King Philip arriving in the army, invested Portalegre; and the garrison, including an English regiment of foot commanded by colonel Stanhope, were made prisoners of war: the next place he besieged was Castle Davide, which met with the same fate: on the other hand, the marquis Das Minas, in order to make a diversion, entered Spain with 15,000 men, took Fuente Grimaldo, in Castile, by assault, defeated a body of French and Spaniards commanded by don Ronquillo, and made himself master of Manseinto: the weather growing excessively hot, Philip sent his troops into quarters of refreshment; and the allies followed his example. Duke Schomberg, finding his advice very little regarded by the Portuguese ministry, and seeing very little prospect of success, desired leave to resign his command, which the queen bestowed on the earl of Galway, who, with a reinforcement of English and Dutch troops, arrived at Lisbon on the thirtieth of July: about the latter end of September, the two kings repaired to the camp near Almeida, resolving to invade Castile; but they found the river Agueda so well guarded by the duke of Berwick, that they would not attempt a passage: they therefore retired into the territories of Portugal, and the army was put into winter-quarters. The Spaniards were now so weakened by detachments sent with the marquis de Villadarias towards Gibraltar, that the duke of Berwick could not execute any scheme of importance during the remaining part of the campaign.

22. The arms of England were not less fortunate by sea than they had been on the Danube: Sir George Rooke, having landed king Charles at Lisbon, sent a squadron to cruise off Cape Spartel, under the command of rear-admiral Dilkes, who, on the twelfth of March, engaged and took three Spanish ships of war, bound from St. Sebastian to Cadiz. Rooke received orders from the queen to sail to the relief of Nice and Villa-Franca, which were threatened with a siege by the duke de Vendome; at the same time he was pressed by king Charles to execute a scheme on Barcelona, projected by the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who declared his opinion, that the Catalonians would declare for the house of Austria as soon as they should be assured of proper support and protection. The ministry of England understanding that the French were employed in equipping a strong squadron at Brest, and judging it was destined to act in the Mediterranean, sent out Sir Cloudesley Shovel with a considerable fleet, to watch the motions of the Brest squadron; and he was provided with instructions how to act, in case it should be sailed to the Mediterranean: meanwhile, Sir George Rooke, in compliance with the entreaties of king Charles, sailed with the transports under his convoy to Barcelona, and on the eighteenth of May appeared before the city: next day, the troops were landed by the prince of Hesse, to the number of 2000, and the Dutch ketches bombarded the place: but by this time the governor had secured the chiefs of the Austrian party; and the people exhibiting no marks of attachment to king Charles, the prince re-embarked his soldiers, from an apprehension of their being attacked and overpowered by superior numbers. On the sixteenth of June Sir George Rooke, being joined by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, resolved to proceed up the Mediterranean in quest of the French fleet, which had sailed thither from Brest, and which Rooke had actually discovered, in the preceding month, on their voyage to Toulon: on the seventeenth of July the admiral called a council of war in the road of Tetuan, when they resolved to make an attempt on Gibraltar, which was but slenderly provided with a garrison: thither they sailed, and on the twenty-first of the month the prince of Hesse landed on the isthmus with 1800 marines: then he summoned the governor to surrender, and was answered, that the place would be defended to the last extremity: next day the admiral gave orders for cannonading the town: perceiving that the enemy were driven from their fortifications at the south mole-head, he commanded captain Whitaker to arm all the boats, and assault that quarter: the captains Hicks and Jumper, who happened to be nearest the mole, immediately manned their pinnaces, and entered the fortifications sword in hand: the Spaniards sprung a mine, by which two lieutenants and about 100 men were killed or wounded; nevertheless, the two captains took possession of a platform, and kept their ground until they were sustained by captain Whitaker and the rest of the seamen, who took by storm a redoubt between the mole and the town: then the governor capitulated; and the prince of Hesse entered the place, amazed at the success of this attempt, considering the strength of the fortifications, which might have been defended by fifty men against a numerous army.

23. A sufficient garrison being left with his highness, the admiral returned to Tetuan, to take in wood and water; and when he sailed, on the ninth of August, he descried the French fleet, to which he gave chase with all the sail he could spread: on the thirteenth he came up with it, as it lay in a line off Malaga ready to receive him, to the number of two and fifty great ships and four and twenty galleys, under the command of the count de Toulouse, high-admiral of France, with the inferior flags of the white and blue divisions: the English fleet consisted of three and fifty ships of the line, exclusive of frigates; but they were inferior to the French in number of guns and men, as well as in weight of metal, and altogether unprovided of galleys, from which the enemy reaped great advantage during the engagement. A little after ten in the morning the battle began with equal fury on both sides, and continued to rage with doubtful success till two in the afternoon, when the van of the French gave way; nevertheless, the fight was maintained till night, when the enemy bore away to leeward: the wind shifting before morning, the French gained the weather-gage; but they made no use of this advantage: for two successive days the English admiral endeavored to renew the engagement, which the count de Toulouse declined, and at last he disappeared: the loss was pretty equal on both sides, though not a single ship was taken or destroyed by either; but the honor of the day certainly remained with the English: over and above the disadvantages we have enumerated, the bottoms of the British fleet were foul; and several large ships had expended all their shot long before the battle ceased: yet the enemy were so roughly handled, that they did not venture another engagement during the whole war. The French king, in order to raise the drooping spirits of his people, claimed the victory, and published an account of the action, which at this distance of time plainly proves that he was reduced to the mean shift of imposing on his subjects by false and partial representations: among other exaggerations in this detail, we find mention made of mischief done to French ships by English bombs; though nothing is more certain than that there was not one bomb-vessel in the combined fleet. The French academy, actuated by a servile spirit of adulation, caused a medal to be struck on the occasion, which, instead of perpetuating the glory of their prince, served only to transmit their own shame to posterity. After the battle, Sir George Rooke sailed to Gibraltar to refit; and leaving a squadron with Sir John Leake, set sail for England on the twenty-fourth of August: he arrived in September, and was received by the ministry and the people in general with those marks of esteem and veneration which were due to his long services and signal success; but he was still persecuted with a spirit of envy and detraction. Philip, king of Spain, alarmed at the reduction of Gibraltar, sent the marquis de Villadarias with an army to retake it: the siege lasted four months, during which the prince of Hesse exhibited many shining proofs of courage and ability: the place was supplied with men and provisions by convoys from Lisbon, until Monsieur de Pointis put a stop to that communication, by entering the bay with a strong squadron; but he was obliged to retire at the approach of Sir John

Leake and admiral Vanderdussen ; and the marquis de Villardias, having made little or no progress on land, thought proper to abandon the enterprise.

24. The parliament of England meeting on the twenty-ninth of October, the queen, in her speech, observed, that the great and remarkable success with which God had blessed her arms produced unanimous joy and satisfaction through all parts of the kingdom ; and that a timely improvement of the present advantages would enable her to procure a lasting foundation of security for England, as well as a firm support for the liberty of Europe : she declared her intention was to be kind and indulgent to all her subjects : she expressed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loss of this opportunity ; and that there would be no contention among them, but an emulation to promote the public welfare. Congratulatory addresses were voted and presented by both houses : they were equal in their professions of duty and affection to the queen ; but the addresses imbibed a very different color from the different sanctions by which the two houses were influenced : the lords congratulated her on the great and glorious success of her arms under the command of the duke of Marlborough, without deigning to mention Sir George Rooke, who had defeated the French navy at sea, and added the important fortress of Gibraltar to the British conquests : on the other hand, the commons affected to mention the battle of Blenheim and Rooke's naval victory as events of equal glory and importance. However they might be warped by prejudice against individuals, they did not suffer the war to languish for want of supplies : having taken into consideration the services of the army and navy, they voted that the queen should be desired to bestow her bounty on the seamen and land forces who had behaved themselves so gallantly : then they deliberated on the different articles of national expense, and granted £4,670,931 for the occasions of the ensuing year, to be raised by a land-tax, by the sale of annuities, and other expedients : these measures were taken with such expedition, that the land-tax received the royal assent on the ninth of December ; when the queen, in a short speech, thanked the commons for their despatch, which she considered a sure pledge of their affection.

25. The high-church party took this occasion to promote the bill against occasional conformity, which was revived and brought into the house on a new model by Mr. William

Bromley, who moved that it might be tacked to the land-tax bill, and sent up to the lords for their concurrence: the court no longer espoused this measure, and the violent party was weakened by defection: after a warm and tedious debate, the tack was rejected by a great majority: the bill, however, passed the house of commons, and was sent up to the lords on the fourteenth of December, when it would hardly have excited a debate, had not the queen been present, and desirous of hearing what could be said on both sides of the question: for the information and satisfaction of her majesty the subject was again discussed, and all the arguments being repeated, the bill was rejected by a majority of one-and-twenty voices. The next subject on which the house of lords employed their attention was the late conduct of the Scottish parliament. Lord Haversham, in a set speech, observed that the settlement of the succession in Scotland had been postponed, partly because the ministry for that kingdom were weak and divided; partly from a received opinion that the succession was never sincerely and cordially intended by those who managed the affairs of Scotland in the cabinet-council: he expatiated on the bad consequences that might attend the act of security, which he styled a bill of exclusion; and particularly mentioned that clause by which the heritors and boroughs were ordained to exercise their fencible men every month: he said the nobility and gentry of Scotland were as learned and brave as any nation in Europe, and generally discontented; that the common people were very numerous, very stout, and very poor; and he asked who was the man that could tell what such a multitude, so armed, and so disciplined, might do under such leaders, could opportunities suit their intention: he recommended these circumstances to the consideration of the house, and concluded with these words of lord Bacon;—‘Let men beware how they neglect or suffer matter of troubles to be prepared; for no man can forbid the sparks that may set all on fire.’ The lords resolved to consider these subjects on the twenty-ninth of November, when the queen repaired to the house of peers to hear the debates, and by her presence moderate the heat of both parties: the earl of Nottingham reflected so severely on the memory of king William, that he would have been sent to the Tower had not the lords declined any such motion out of respect to her majesty. After much declamation on the Scottish act of security, the grand committee of the peers, by the advice of lord Wharton, resolved that the queen should be enabled by act of parliament, on the part of England, to name commissioners to treat about a union with Scotland, provided that the parliament of Scotland should first appoint commissioners on their part for the same purpose: that no Scotsmen should enjoy the privileges of Englishmen, except such as were settled in England, Ireland, and the plantations, and such as were or might be in the sea or land-service, until a union could be effected, or the succession settled as in England: that the traffic by cattle from Scotland to England should be prevented: that the lord-admiral should issue orders for taking such vessels as should be found trading from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her majesty's enemies; and that care should be taken to prevent the exportation of English wool into Scotland. On these resolutions a bill was formed for an intire union, and passed the house on the twentieth of December: the lords presented an address to the queen, representing that they had duly weighed the dangerous and pernicious effects that were likely to be produced by divers acts of parliament lately passed in Scotland: that they were of opinion the safety of the kingdom required that speedy and effectual orders should be given to put Newcastle in a posture of defence, to secure the port of Teignmouth, and repair the fortifications of Hull and Carlisle: they likewise advised her majesty to give directions for disciplining the militia of the four northern counties; for providing them with arms and ammunition; for maintaining a competent number of regular troops on the northern borders of England, as well as in the north of Ireland; and for putting the laws in execution against papists: the queen promised that a survey should be made of the places they had mentioned, and laid before the parliament, and that she would give the necessary directions on the other articles of the address. The commons seemed to concur with the lords in their sentiments of the Scottish act of security: they resolved that a bill should be brought in for the effectual securing the kingdom of England from the apparent dangers that might arise from several acts lately passed in the parliament of Scotland; and this was formed on nearly the same resolutions which had been taken in the upper house: the bill sent down by the lords was thrice read, and ordered to lie on the table; but they passed their own, to take effect at Christmas, provided before that time the Scots should not settle the succession : when it was offered to the lords, they passed it without any amendment, contrary to the expectation, and even to the hope of some members who were no friends to the house of Hanover, and firmly believed the lords would have treated this bill with the same contempt which had been manifested for that which they had sent down to the commons.

26. The duke of Marlborough, at his first appearance in the house after his return to England, was honored with a very extraordinary eulogium pronounced by the lord keeper, in the name of the peers of England ; and a compliment of the same nature was presented to him by a committee of the house of commons : Doctor Delaune, vice-chancellor of Oxford, accompanied by the principal members of the university, attended the queen with an address of congratulation on the success of her arms in Germany, under the admirable conduct and invincible courage of the duke of Marlborough ; and at sea, under the most brave and faithful admiral Sir George Rooke : he received a civil answer from her majesty, though now she took umbrage at Rooke's being raised on a level with the duke of Marlborough, whose great victories had captivated her admiration, and whose wife had alienated her affection from the tories. The commons, perceiving how high he stood in her majesty's esteem, and having been properly tutored for the purpose, took into consideration the great services of the duke ; and, in an address, besought her majesty to consider some proper means to perpetuate the memory of such noble actions : in a few days she gave them to understand by a message, that she was inclined to grant the interest of the crown in the honor and manor of Woodstock and hundred of Wooton to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs ; and that as the lieutenancy and rangership of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds, were granted for two lives, she wished that encumbrance could be removed : a bill was immediately brought in, enabling the queen to bestow these honors and manors on the duke of Marlborough and his heirs ; and the queen was desired to advance the money for clearing the encumbrances : she not only complied with this address, but likewise ordered the comptroller of her works to build in Woodstock-park a magnificent palace for the duke, on a plan much more solid than beautiful : by this time Sir George Rooke was laid aside, and the command of the fleet bestowed on Sir Cloudesley Shovel, now declared rear-admiral of England. Marshal de Tallard, with the other French generals taken at Hochstadt, arrived on the sixteenth of December in the river Thames, and were immediately conveyed to Nottingham and Lichfield, attended by a detachment of the royal regiment of horse guards: they were treated with great respect, and allowed the privilege of riding ten miles around the places of their confinement.

27. While the house of commons, in two successive addresses, thanked the queen for the treaty which the duke of Marlborough had concluded with Prussia concerning the troops to be sent to the duke of Savoy, and desired she would use her interest with the allies, that they might next year furnish their complete proportions of men by sea and land; the lords examined into all the proceedings at sea, and all the instructions of the admiralty; and presented an address to the queen, explaining all the different articles of mismanagement: she promised to consider them particularly, and give such directions on them as might be most for the advantage of the public service. The remaining part of the session was consumed in disputes and altercations between the two houses on the subject of the Aylesbury constables, who were sued by five other inhabitants for having denied them the right of voting at the election: these five persons were committed to Newgate by order of the house of commons: they moved for a habeas corpus in the queen's bench; but the court would take no cognisance of the affair: two of the prisoners petitioned the queen that their case might be brought before her majesty in parliament: the commons, in an address, besought the queen to refuse granting a writ of error in this case, which would tend to the overthrowing the undoubted rights and privileges of the commons of England: she assured them she would not do any thing to give them just cause of complaint; but this matter relating to the course of judicial proceedings, being of the highest importance, she thought it necessary to weigh and consider very carefully what might be proper for her to do in a thing of so great concern: they voted all the lawyers who had pleaded on the return of the habeas corpus in behalf of the prisoners guilty of a breach of privilege, and ordered them to be taken into custody: they likewise ordered the prisoners to be removed from Newgate into the custody of their sergeant at arms, lest they should have been discharged by the queen's granting writs of error: the prisoners, finding themselves at the mercy of the exasperated commons, petitioned the lords for relief: the upper house passed six different resolutions against the conduct of the commons, as being an obstruction to justice, and contrary to Magna Charta<sup>3</sup>: the lower house demanded a conference, in which they insisted on the sole right of determining elections; they affirmed, that they only could judge who had a right of voting; and that they were judges of their own privileges, in which the lords could not intermeddle.

28. The upper house demanded a free conference, which proved ineffectual: new resolutions were taken by the commons diametrically opposite to those of the peers, who, on the other hand, attended the queen with a long representation of all the particulars relating to this affair: they affirmed that the proceedings of the house of commons against the Aylesbury men were wholly new and unprecedented; that it was the birthright of every Englishman, who apprehended himself injured, to seek for redress in her majesty's courts of justice; that if any power could control this right, and prescribe when he should, and when he should not be allowed the benefit of the laws, he ceased to be a freeman, and his liberty and property were precarious: they requested therefore that no consideration whatever should prevail with her majesty to suffer an obstruction to the known course of justice; but that she would be pleased to give effectual orders for the immediate issuing of the writs of error. The queen assured them that she would have complied with their request; but, finding an absolute necessity for putting an immediate end to the session, she knew there could be no farther proceedings on that matter: on the very day, which was the fourteenth of March, she went to the house of lords, and passed the bills that were ready for the royal assent: then she thanked the parliament for having despatched the public business; she warned them to avoid the fatal effects of animosity and dissension; and ordered the lord keeper to prorogue them to Thursday the first of May; but on the fifth of April they were dissolved by proclamation, and another was published for calling a new parliament.<sup>3</sup> The queen, accompanied by the prince of Denmark, made an excursion to Newmarket, and afterwards dined by invitation with the university of Cambridge, where she conferred the honor of knighthood on Dr. Ellis, the vice-chancellor; on James Montague, counsel for the university; and on the celebrated Isaac Newton, mathematical professor. The two houses of convocation still continued at variance: the lower house penned petulant representations, and the archbishop answered them by verbal reprehension and admonition. The tory interest was now in the wane: the duke of Buckinghamshire was deprived of the privy-seal, and that office conferred on the duke of Newcastle, a nobleman of powerful influence with the whig party: the earl of Montague was created marquis of Mount-hermer and duke of Montague; the earl of Peterborough and lord Cholmondeley were chosen of the privy-council; and lord Cutts was sent to command the troops in Ireland, under the duke of Ormond.

29. The ministry of Scotland was now intirely changed: the marquis of Tweeddale and Johnstone, having been found unequal to the undertaking, were dismissed: the duke of Queensbury resumed the management of affairs in that kingdom under the title of lord privy-seal; and the office of commissioner was conferred on the young duke of Argyle, who succeeded to his father's influence among the presbyterians: he was a nobleman possessed of good natural talents, which had not been neglected; candid, open, and sincere; brave, passionate, and aspiring: had he been endued with a greater share of liberality, his character would have been truly heroic: at this juncture he was instructed to procure an act of the Scottish parliament, settling the protestant succession; or to set on foot a treaty for the union of the two kingdoms. At the opening of the session in June, the members were divided into three parties: namely, the cavaliers or Jacobites; the revolutioners; the squadrone volante, or flying squadron, headed by the marquis of Tweeddale, who disclaimed the other two factions, and pretended to act from the dictates of conscience alone: the parliament was adjourned to the third of July, when her majesty's letter was read, earnestly recommending the settlement of the succession in the protestant line, and an act for a commission to treat of a union between the two kingdoms. The marquis of Annandale proposed that the parliament should proceed on the limitations and conditions of government; that a committee should be appointed to consider the condition of the coin and the commerce of the nation: the earl of Mar moved, that the house would, preferably to all other business, consider the means for engaging in a treaty with England: after a long debate, they resolved to proceed on the coin and the commerce: schemes for supplying the nation with money by a paper-credit were presented by Dr. Hugh Chamberlayne and John Law, but rejected: the house resolved, that any kind of paper-credit, by the circulation of bills, was an improper expedient; and appointed a council to put the laws relating to trade in execution. The duke of Hamilton proposed that the parliament should not proceed to the nomination of a successor until the treaty with England should be discussed, and the limitations settled: this proposal being approved, a draft of an answer to her majesty's letter was presented by the marquis of Tweeddale: two different forms of an act for a treaty with England were offered by the earl of Mar and the marquis of Lothian; others were produced concerning the elections of officers of state, and the regulation of commerce.

30. The chief aim of the cavaliers was to obstruct the settlement of the succession; and with that view they pressed the project of limitations, to which they knew the court would never assent: a motion being made, to grant the first reading to an act of commission for a treaty with England, the duke of Hamilton insisted on the limitations; and a vote being stated in these terms; 'Proceed to consider the act for a treaty of limitation,' the latter was carried in favor of the cavaliers: on the twenty-second of August an act for this purpose was approved; and the next day an act for a triennial parliament, which the courtiers were enabled to defeat: they likewise passed an act, ordaining that the Scottish ambassadors representing Scotland should be present when the sovereign might have occasion to treat with foreign princes and states, and be accountable to the parliament of Scotland. Fletcher, of Saltoun, presented a scheme of limitations that savored strongly of republican principles: he afterwards enlarged on every article, endeavoring to prove that they were absolutely necessary to prevent the consequences of English influence; to enable the nation to defend its rights and liberties; to deter ministers of state giving bad advice to their sovereign; to preserve the courts of judicature from corruption, and screen the people from tyranny and oppression: the earl of Stair having argued against these limitations, Fletcher replied, 'it was no wonder he opposed the scheme; for had such an act subsisted, his lordship would have been hanged for the bad counsel he had given to king James, for the concern he had in the massacre of Glencoe, and for his conduct since the revolution.' The next subject on which the parliament deliberated was the conspiracy: a motion being made that the house might know what answer the queen had returned to their address in the last session, the chancellor delivered to the clerk-register the papers relating to the plot, that they might be perused by the members; but these being copies, and the evidences remaining at London, no farther progress was made in the affair: yet the duke of Athol, in a distinct narrative of the pretended conspiracy, [1705.] boldly accused the duke of Queensbury of having endeavored to mislead the queen by false insinuations against her good subjects. When the act for a treaty of union fell under consideration, a draft for that purpose, presented by the earl of Mar, was compared with the English act, importing that the queen should name and appoint not only the commissioners for England, but likewise those for Scotland. Fletcher did not fail to inveigh against the imperious conduct of the English parliament in this affair: he exhorted the house to resent such treatment; and offered the draft of an address to her majesty on the subject; but this the house rejected: duke Hamilton proposed that a clause might be added to the act, importing, that the union should no ways derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights, liberties, and dignities of the Scottish nation: this occasioned a long debate; and the question being put, was carried in the negative: another clause was proposed, that the Scottish commissioners should not begin to treat until the English parliament should have rescinded their clause, enacting that the subjects of Scotland should be adjudged and taken as aliens after the twenty-fifth of December: the courtiers, considering the temper of the house, would not venture to oppose this motion directly, but proposed that the clause should be formed into a separate act; and the expedient was approved. Though the duke of Athol entered a vigorous protest, to which the greater part of the cavaliers and all the squadrone adhered, comprehending four-and-twenty peers, seven-and-thirty barons, and eighteen boroughs, the act for the treaty of union was, after much altercation, finished, empowering commissioners to meet and treat of a union; but restraining them from treating of any alterations of the church government as by law established: whilst this important subject was under consideration, the duke of Hamilton, to the amazement of his whole party, moved that the nomination of the commissioners should be left to the queen: fourteen or fifteen of the cavaliers ran out of the house in a transport of indignation, exclaiming that they were deserted and basely betrayed by the duke of Hamilton: a very hot debate ensued, in the course of which the duke was severely handled by those whom he had hitherto conducted: but, at length, the question being put, whether the nomination should be left to the queen or to the parliament, the duke's motion was approved by a very small majority: he afterwards excused himself for his defection, by saying he saw it was in vain to contend; and that since the court had acquired a great majority, he thought he might be allowed to pay that compliment to his sovereign: he was desirous of being in the commission, and the duke of Argyle promised he should be nominated: the queen refusing to honor him with that mark of distinction, Argyle would not suffer himself to be named, and threatened to oppose the union; but means were found to appease his resentment. Two drafts of an address being presented by the earl of Sutherland and Fletcher of Saltoun, beseeching her majesty to use her endeavors with the parliament of England to rescind that part of their act which declared the subjects of Scotland aliens; and an overture of a bill being offered, ordaining that the Scottish commissioners should not enter on the treaty of union until that clause should be repealed; the courtiers moved that the parliament should proceed by way of order to their commissioners, and by address to her majesty: after some debate, the house assenting to this proposal, the order and address were drawn up and approved. The great and weighty affair of the treaty being at length happily transacted, though not without a protest by Athol and his adherents, the parliament granted a supply of £50,000, and the house was adjourned to the twentieth of December: then the queen declared the earl of Mar secretary of state in the room of the marquis of Annandale, who was appointed lord president of the council.

31. In Ireland the parliament met at Dublin on the fifth of March, and voted £150,000 for the support of the necessary branches of the establishment. A dispute arose between the commons and the lower house of convocation, relating to the tithes of hemp and flax, ascertained in a clause of a bill for the better improvement of the hempen and flaxen manufactures of the kingdom: the lower house of convocation presented a memorial against this clause as prejudicial to the rights and properties of the clergy: the commons voted the person who brought it in guilty of a breach of privilege, and ordered him to be taken into custody: then they resolved that the convocation were guilty of a contempt and breach of the privilege of that house: the convocation presuming to justify their memorial, the commons voted, that all matters relating to it should be rased out of the journals and books of convocation. The duke of Ormond, dreading the consequences of such heats, adjourned the parliament to the first of May, when the houses meeting again, came to some resolutions that reflected obliquely on the convocation, as enemies to her majesty's government and the protestant succession: the clergy, in order to acquit themselves of all suspicion, resolved, in their turn, that the church and nation had been happily delivered from popery and tyranny by king William at the revolution; that the continuance of these blessings were due, under God, to the auspicious reign and happy government of her majesty, queen Anne; that the future security and preservation of the church and nation depended wholly, under God, on the succession of the crown as settled by law in the protestant line; that if any clergyman should by word or writing declare any thing in opposition to these resolutions, they should look on him as a sower of divisions among the protestants, and an enemy to the constitution: they levelled another resolution against the presbyterians, importing, that to teach or to preach against the doctrine, government, rites, or ceremonies of the church, or to maintain schools or seminaries for the education of youth in principles contrary to those of the established church, was a contempt of the ecclesiastical laws of the kingdom, of pernicious consequence, and served only to continue and widen the unhappy schisms and divisions in the nation. In June the parliament was prorogued to the same month of the following year: then the duke of Ormond embarked for England, leaving the administration in the hands of Sir Richard Cox, lord chancellor; and lord Cutts, the commander in chief of the queen's forces; who were appointed lords justices during the duke's absence.

32. During these transactions in Great Britain and Ireland, the allies had not been remiss in their preparations for the ensuing campaign. The duke of Marlborough had fixed on the Moselle for the scene of action ; and magazines of all sorts were formed at Triers : on the thirteenth of March the duke embarked for Holland, where he prevailed on the States-General to contribute their troops for the execution of his project : having concerted with the deputies of the States and the Dutch generals the necessary measures for opening the campaign, he set out for Maestricht, in order to assemble his army. On the fifth of May the emperor Leopold died at Vienna, and was succeeded on the imperial throne by his eldest son Joseph, king of the Romans, a prince who resembled his father in meekness of disposition, narrowness of intellect, and bigotry to the Romish religion : on the fifteenth of June the English troops passed the Maese, and continued their march towards the Moselle, under the command of general Churchill ; and the duke set out for Creutznach, to confer with prince Louis of Baden, who excused himself on pretence of being much indisposed : Marlborough visited him at Rastadt, where in a conference they resolved that a sufficient number of German troops should be left for the security of the lines of Lauterburg and Stolhoffen under the command of general Thungen, and that prince Louis of Baden should march with a large detachment towards the Saar, to act in concert with the duke of Marlborough. The confederate army passed the Moselle and the Saar in the beginning of June, and encamped at Elft in sight of the enemy, who retired with great precipitation, and intrenched themselves in the neighborhood of Coningsmarcheren : the duke's design was to besiege Saar-Louis ; but prince Louis failed in the performance of his engagement : he feigned himself sick, and repaired to the bath at Schlangenbade, leaving the small number of imperial troops he conducted as far as Creutznach under the command of the count de Frize : he was suspected of treachery ; but probably acted from envy of the duke's military reputation.<sup>3</sup>

33. While this nobleman sustained such a mortifying disappointment on the Moselle, the French did not fail to make advantage of their superiority in the Netherlands,

<sup>3</sup> The duke of Marlborough finding himself obliged to retreat, sent a note with a trumpeter to Villars, containing an apology for decamping. 'Do me the justice,' said he, 'to believe that my retreat is intirely owing to the failure of the prince of Baden ; but that my esteem for you is still greater than my resentment of his conduct.'

where general D'Auverquerque was obliged to stand on the defensive: they invested Huy, and carried on their operations so vigorously, that in a few days the garrison were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war: then Villeroy undertook the reduction of Liege, and actually began his works before the citadel. Marlborough was no sooner informed of the enemy's progress, than he marched to Triers, where in a council it was resolved that the army should return to the Netherlands: the troops were in motion on the nineteenth of June, and marched with such expedition, that they passed the Maese on the first of July: Villeroy, having received advice of the duke's approach, abandoned his enterprise, and retired to Tongeren, from whence he retreated within his lines, that reached from Marche aux Dames on the Meuse, along the Mehaigne, as far as Lenuive. Marlborough, having joined D'Auverquerque, sent general Scholten with a detachment to invest Huy, and in a few days the garrison surrendered at discretion: the English general, resolving to strike some stroke of importance that should atone for his disappointment on the Moselle, sent general Hompesch to the States, with a proposal for attacking the French lines, and obtained their permission to do whatever he should think proper for the good of the common cause: then he explained the scheme in two successive councils of war, by which at length it was approved and resolved on, though some Dutch generals declared themselves against the undertaking. The enemy were posted along the lines, amounting to 100 battalions and 146 squadrons; the allied army did not much exceed that number: in order to divide them, D'Auverquerque made a false motion, and passed the Mehaigne, as if he had intended to attack the lines about Messelin: the stratagem succeeded: the French weakened the other parts by strengthening that which was on the side of the Gerbise towards Namur. The duke of Marlborough having made the disposition, the army began to march in the night between the seventeenth and eighteenth of July, in order to force a passage of the French lines at Heylesem, the castle of Wauge, and the villages of Wauge, Neerhespen, and Oostmalen: these posts were taken with very little difficulty; but before the infantry could come up, the enemy advanced with fifty squadrons and twenty battalions, and began to fire from eight pieces of cannon with triple barrels, which did considerable execution: the duke, perceiving that they were continually reinforced from the other parts of the lines, ordered the horse to charge their cavalry, which were soon broken and routed; but rallying behind their infantry interlined with foot, and joined by fresh squadrons, they advanced again towards the allies, who were now sustained by their infantry, and moved forwards to renew the charge. After a warm, though short engagement, the enemy's horse were defeated with great slaughter; the infantry, seeing themselves abandoned in the plain, retreated in great disorder, between the villages of Heylesem and Golstevan, where they were joined by the rest of their army, and formed again in order of battle: meanwhile the duke of Marlborough ordered all his troops to enter the lines; and extended his right towards the great Geete before Tirlemont, where the enemy had left the battalion of Montluc, which surrendered at discretion. In this action the confederates took the marquis D'Alegre and the count de Horne, lieutenant-generals; one major-general, two brigadier-generals, with many other officers, and a great number of common soldiers; a large heap of standards, four colors, one pair of kettle-drums, and ten pieces of cannon. In the action, as the duke of Marlborough advanced to the charge at the head of several squadrons, a Bavarian officer rode up to attack him sword in hand; but in raising himself on his stirrups to strike with the greater advantage, he fell from his horse, and was immediately slain.

34. The body of troops commanded by Monsieur D'Alegre being thus defeated with little or no loss to the confederates, the elector of Bavaria and the marshal de Villeroy passed the great Geete and the Deule with great expedition, and took possession of the strong camp at Parck, their left extending to Rooselaer, and their right to Wineselen against the height of Louvain: next day the duke of Marlborough marching through the plain of Parck, took 1200 prisoners, who could not keep pace with the rest of the enemy's forces; and in the evening he encamped with the right at the abbey of Vliersbeck, and the left before Bierbeck, under the cannon of Louvain: he detached lieutenant-general Henkelum, the duke of Wirtemberg, and count Oxenstiern, with a considerable body of forces, to attack some posts on the Deule, which were slenderly guarded: their advanced guard accordingly passed the river and repulsed the enemy; but for want of timely support, they were obliged to pass it and retire. On the third of August baron Spaar, with a body of Dutch troops, marched to Raboth on the canal of Bruges, forced the French lines at Lovendegen, and took four forts by which they were defended; but receiving advice that the enemy were on their march towards him, he retired to Mildegem, and carried with him several hostages, as security for the payment of the contributions he had raised: on the fifteenth the duke moved from Mildert to Corbais; next day continued his march to Genap, from whence he advanced to Fischermont: on the seventeenth general D'Auverquerque took the post of Waterloo; and next day the confederate army was drawn up in order of battle before the enemy, who extended from Overysche, near the wood of Soignies, to Neerysche, with the little river Ysche in their front, so as to cover Brussels and Louvain. The duke of Marlborough proposed to attack them immediately, before they could recollect themselves from their consternation, and D'Auverquerque approved of the design; but it was opposed by general Schlangenburg and other Dutch officers, who represented it in such a light to the deputies of the States, that they refused to concur in the execution. The duke, being obliged to relinquish the scheme, wrote an expostulatory letter to the States-General, complaining of their having withdrawn that confidence which they had reposed in him while he acted in Germany: this letter being published at the Hague, excited murmurs among the people; and the English nation were incensed at the presumption of the deputies, who wrote several letters in their own justification to the States-General; but these had no effect on the populace, by whom the duke was respected even to a degree of adoration. The States, being apprised of the resentment that prevailed over all England, and that the earl of Pembroke, lord-president of the council, was appointed as envoy extraordinary to Holland, with instructions to demand satisfaction, thought proper to anticipate his journey, by making submissions to the duke, and removing Schlangenburg from his command. The confederate army returned to Corbais; from whence it marched to Perwitz, where it encamped: the little town of Sout-Leeuwe, situated in the middle of a morass, and constituting the chief defence of the enemy's lines, being taken by a detachment under the command of lieutenant-general Dedem, the duke ordered the lines from this place to Wasseigne to be levelled, and the town of Tirlemont to be dismantled; then, passing the Demer, he encamped on the nineteenth of

September at Aerschot: about the latter end of the month he marched to Heventhals; from hence the duke repaired to the Hague, where he had several conferences with the pensionary: in a few days he returned to the army, which decamping from Heventhals, marched to Clamphout: on the twenty-fourth of October, the count de Noyelles invested Santvliet, which surrendered before the end of the month.

35. At this period, the duke, in consequence of pressing letters from the emperor, set out for Vienna, in order to concert the operations of the ensuing campaign, and other measures of importance, in which the concerns of the allies were interested: in his way he was magnificently entertained by the elector palatine, and him of Triers, and complimented by the magistracy of Frankfort, where he conferred with prince Louis of Baden: on the twelfth of November he arrived at Vienna, where he was treated with the highest marks of distinction and cordial friendship by their imperial majesties: his son-in-law, the earl of Sunderland, had been sent thither as envoy extraordinary; and now they conferred together with the emperor and his ministers: they resolved to maintain the war with redoubled vigor: the treaties were renewed, and provision made for the security of the duke of Savoy. The emperor, in consideration of the duke's signal service to the house of Austria, presented him with a grant of the lordship of Mindelheim in Suabia, which was now erected into a principality of the Roman empire: on his return with the earl of Sunderland, he visited the courts of Berlin and Hanover, where he was received with that extraordinary respect which was due to his character; and arrived at the Hague on the fourteenth of December: there he settled the operations of the next campaign with the States-General, who consented to join England in maintaining an additional body of 10,000 men, as a reinforcement to the army of prince Eugene in Italy. While the allies were engaged in the siege of Santvliet, the elector of Bavaria sent a detachment, under the command of don Marcello de Grimaldi, to invest Diest, the garrison of which were made prisoners of war.

36. On the Upper Rhine marshal Villars besieged and took Homburg, and passed the Rhine at Strasburg on the sixth of August: prince Louis of Baden arriving in the camp of the imperialists at Stolhoffen, not only obliged him to retire; but having passed the river, forced the French lines at Hagenau: then he reduced Drusenheim and Hagenau, but attempted no enterprise equal to the number of his army, although the emperor had expostulated with him severely on his conduct, and he had now a fair opportunity of emulating the glory of Marlborough, on whom he looked with the eyes of an envious rival. In Italy a battle was fought at Casano, between prince Eugene and the duke de Vendome with dubious success: the duke de Feuillade reduced Chivas, and invested Nice, which, after an obstinate defence, surrendered in December: all the considerable places belonging to the duke of Savoy were now taken, except Coni and Turin; and his little army was reduced to 12,000 men, whom he could hardly support: his duchess, his clergy, and his subjects in general pressed him to submit to the necessity of his affairs; but he adhered to the alliance with surprising fortitude: he withstood the importunities of his duchess; excluded all the bishops and clergy from his councils; and when he had occasion for a confessor, chose a priest occasionally either from the Dominicans or Franciscans. The campaign in Portugal began with a very promising aspect: the allies invaded Spain by the different frontiers of Beyra and Alentejo: their army, under the command of the conde das Galveas, undertook the siege of Valencia d'Alcantara in May, and took it by assault; Albuquerque surrendered on articles; and then the troops were sent into quarters of refreshment. the marquis de las Minas, who commanded the Portuguese in the province of Beyra, reduced the town of Salva-terra; plundered and burned Sarca; but was obliged to retire to Panamacos at the approach of the enemy. Towards the end of September the confederates being re-assembled, invested Badajoz by the advice of the earl of Galway, who lost his right hand by a cannon-ball, and was obliged to be carried off; so that the conduct of the siege was left to general Fagel: he had made considerable progress towards the reduction of the place, when the marquis de Thessé found means to throw in a powerful reinforcement; and then the confederates abandoned the enterprise. The war continued to rage in Hungary with various success: Ragotski, though frequently worsted, appeared still in arms, and ravaged the country, which became a scene of misery and desolation. In Poland the old cardinal-primate owned Stanislaus, but died before the coronation, which was performed by the bishop of Cujavia: in the beginning of the winter king Augustus had passed through Poland in disguise to the Muscovite army, which was put under his command in Lithuania; and the campaign was protracted through the whole winter-season, notwithstanding the severity of the weather in that northern climate: in the spring the Swedish general, Reinchild, obtained a complete victory over the Saxon army, which was either cut in pieces or taken, with their camp, baggage, and artillery; yet the war was not extinguished: the king of Sweden continued obstinately deaf to all proposals of peace, and was become as savage in his manners as brutal in his revenge.

37. At sea the arms of the allies were generally prosperous: Philip of Spain, being obstinately bent on retaking Gibraltar, sent marshal de Thessé to renew the siege, while De Pointis was ordered to block up the place by sea with his squadron: these French officers carried on the siege with such activity, that the prince of Hesse despatched an express to Lisbon with a letter, desiring Sir John Leake to sail immediately to his assistance: this admiral, having been reinforced from England by Sir Thomas Dilkes with five ships of the line and a body of troops, set sail immediately; and on the tenth of March descried five ships of war hauling out of the bay of Gibraltar: these were commanded by De Pointis in person, to whom the English admiral gave chase: one of them struck, after having made a very slight resistance; and the rest ran ashore to the westward of Marbella, where they were destroyed: the remaining part of the French squadron had been blown from their anchors, and taken shelter in the bay of Malaga; but now they slipped their cables, and made the best of their way to Toulon: marshal de Thessé, in consequence of this disaster, turned the siege into a blockade, and withdrew the greater part of his forces. While Sir John Leake was employed in this expedition, Sir George Byng, who had been ordered to cruise in soundings for the protection of trade, took a ship of forty guns from the enemy, together with twelve privateers, and seven vessels richly laden from the West-Indies.

38. But the most eminent achievement of this summer, was the reduction of Barcelona by the celebrated earl of Peterborough and Sir Cloudesley Shovel, who sailed from St. Helens in the latter end of May with the English fleet, having on board a body of 5000 land forces; and on the twentieth of June arrived at Lisbon, where they were joined by Sir John Leake and the Dutch admiral Allemonde: in a council of war, they determined to put to sea with eight-and-forty ships of the line, which should be stationed between Cape Spartel and the bay of Cadiz, in order to prevent the junction of the Toulon and Brest squadrons: the prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, arriving from Gibraltar, assured king Charles that the province of Catalonia and the kingdom of Valencia were attached to his interest; and his majesty being weary of Portugal, resolved to accompany the earl of Peterborough to Barcelona: he accordingly embarked with him on board of the Ranelagh; and the fleet sailed on the twenty-eighth of July, the earl of Galway having reinforced them with two regiments of English dragoons: at Gibraltar they took on board the English guards, and three old regiments, in lieu of which they left two new-raised battalions: on the eleventh of August they anchored in the bay of Altea, where the earl of Peterborough published a manifesto in the Spanish language, which had such an effect, that all the inhabitants of the place, the neighboring villages, and adjacent mountains, acknowledged king Charles as their lawful sovereign: they seized the town of Denia for his service; and he sent thither a garrison of 400 men under the command of major-general Ramos: on the twenty-second they arrived in the bay of Barcelona; the troops were disembarked to the eastward of the city, where they encamped in a strong situation, and were well received by the country people: king Charles landed amidst the acclamations of an infinite multitude from the neighboring towns and villages, who threw themselves at his feet, exclaiming 'Long live the king!' and exhibited all the marks of the most extravagant joy. The inhabitants of Barcelona were well affected to the house of Austria, but overawed by a garrison of 5000 men under the duke de Popoli, Velasco, and other officers devoted to the interest of king Philip: considering the strength of such a garrison, and the small number of Dutch and English troops, nothing could appear more desperate and dangerous than the design of besieging the place; yet this was proposed by the prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, who served in the expedition as a volunteer, strongly urged by king Charles, and approved by the earl of Peterborough and Sir Cloudesley Shovel: the city was accordingly invested on one side; but as a previous step to the reduction of it, they resolved to attack the fort of Montjuic, strongly situated on a hill that commanded the city: the outworks were taken by storm with the loss of the gallant prince of Hesse, who was shot through the body, and expired in a few hours : then the earl of Peterborough began to bombard the body of the fort ; and a shell chancing to fall into the magazine of powder, blew it up, together with the governor and some of the best officers ; an accident, which struck such a terror into the garrison, that they surrendered without farther resistance.

39. This great point being gained, the English general erected his batteries against the town, with the help of the Miquelets and seamen : the bomb-ketches began to fire with such execution, that in a few days the governor capitulated, and on the fourth of October king Charles entered in triumph :<sup>4</sup> all the other places in Catalonia declared for him, except Roses ; so that the largest and richest province of Spain was conquered with an army scarce double the number of the garrison of Barcelona. King Charles wrote a letter with his own hand to the queen of England, containing a circumstantial detail of his affairs, the warmest expressions of acknowledgement, and the highest encomiums on her subjects, particularly the earl of Peterborough : in a council of war it was determined that the king and the earl should continue in Catalonia with the land forces ; that Sir Cloudesley Shovel should return to England ; that five-and-twenty English and fifteen Dutch ships of war should winter at Lisbon under the command of Sir John Leake and the Dutch rear-admiral, Wassenaer ; and that four English and two Dutch frigates should remain at Barcelona : don

<sup>4</sup> Voltaire, on what authority we know not, tells us, that during the capitulation, the German and Catalonian troops found means to climb over the ramparts into the city, and began to commit the most barbarous excesses : the viceroy complained to Peterborough that his soldiers had taken an unfair advantage of the treaty, and were actually employed in burning, plundering, murdering, and violating the inhabitants : the earl replied, ‘ they must then be the troops of the prince of Hesse : allow me to enter the city with my English forces ; I will save it from ruin, oblige the Germans to retire, and march back again to our present situation.’ The viceroy trusted his honor, and forthwith admitted the earl with his troops : he soon drove out the Germans and Catalonians, after having obliged them to quit the plunder they had taken ; and by accident he rescued the duchess of Popoli from the hands of two brutal soldiers, and delivered her to her husband : having thus appeased the tumult, and dispelled the horrors of the citizens, he returned to his former station, leaving the inhabitants of Barcelona amazed at such an instance of magnanimity and moderation in a people whom they had been taught to consider as the most savage barbarians.

Francisco de Velasco was transported to Malaga with about 1000 men of his garrison; the rest voluntarily engaged in the service of king Charles, and six other regiments were raised by the states of Catalonia. The count de Cifuentes, at the head of the Miquelets and Catalans attached to the house of Austria, secured Tarragona, Tortosa, Lerida, San-Mattheo, Gironne, and other places: don Raphael Nevat, revolting from Philip with his whole regiment of horse, joined general Ramos at Denia, and made themselves masters of several places of importance in the kingdom of Valencia: flushed with such unexpected success, they penetrated to the capital of the same name, which they surprised, together with the marquis de Villa-Garcia, the viceroy, and the archbishop. These advantages, however, were not properly improved: the court of Charles was divided into factions; and so much time lost in disputes, that the enemy sent a body of 6000 men into the kingdom of Valencia, under the command of the conde de las Torres, who forthwith invested San-Mattheo, guarded by colonel Jones at the head of 500 Miquelets. This being a place of great consequence, on account of its situation, the earl of Peterborough marched thither with 1000 infantry and 200 dragoons; and by means of feigned intelligence artfully conveyed to the conde, induced that general to abandon the siege with precipitation, in the apprehension of being suddenly attacked by a considerable army: Peterborough afterwards took possession of Nules; and purchasing horses at Castillon de la Plana, began to form a body of cavalry, which did good service in the sequel: having assembled a little army, consisting of ten squadrons of horse and dragoons, and four battalions of regular troops, with about 3000 militia, he marched to Molviedro, which was surrendered to him by the governor, brigadier Mahoni: between this officer and the duke d'Arcos, the Spanish general, he excited such jealousies by dint of artifices, not altogether justifiable even in war, that the duke was more intent on avoiding the supposed treachery of Mahoni than on interrupting the earl's march to Valencia, where the inhabitants expressed uncommon marks of joy at his arrival. About this period a very obstinate action happened at St. Istevan de Litera, where the chevalier d'Asfeld, with nine squadrons of horse and dragoons, and as many battalions of French infantry, attacked colonel Wills at the head of a small detachment; but this last being supported by lieutenant-general Cunningham, who was mortally wounded in the engagement, repulsed the enemy, though three times his number, with the loss of 400 men killed on the spot: the troops on both sides fought with the most desperate valor, keeping up their fire until the muzzles of their pieces met, and charging each other at the point of the bayonet. The only misfortune that attended the English arms in the course of this year, was the capture of the Baltic fleet homeward-bound with their convoy of three ships of war, which were taken by the Dunkirk squadron under the command of the count de St. Paul, though he himself was killed in the engagement. When an account of this advantage was communicated to the French king, he replied with a sigh, 'Very well; I wish the ships were safe again in any English port, provided the count de St. Paul could be restored to life.' After the death of the famous Du Bart, this officer was counted the best seaman in France.

40. The kingdom of England was now wholly engrossed by the election of members for the new parliament: the tories exerted themselves with great industry, and propagated the cry of the church's being in danger; a cry, in which the Jacobites joined with great fervor: but, notwithstanding all their efforts in words and writing, a majority of whigs was returned; and now the lord Godolphin, who had hitherto maintained a neutrality, thought proper openly to countenance that faction: by his interest co-operating with the influence of the duchess of Marlborough, Sir Nathan Wright was deprived of the great seal, which was committed to Mr. William Cowper, with the title of lord keeper: this was a lawyer of good extraction, superior talents, engaging manners, and eminence in his profession: he was stanch to whig principles, and for many years had been considered as one of their best speakers in the house of commons. The new parliament meeting on the twenty-fifth of October, a violent contest arose about the choice of a speaker: Mr. Bromley was supported by the tories, and the whigs proposed Mr. John Smith, who was elected by a majority of forty-three voices: the queen in her speech represented the necessity of acting vigorously against France, as a common enemy to the liberties of Europe: she commended the fortitude of the duke of Savoy, which she said was without example: she told them her intention was to expedite commissions for treating of a union with Scotland: she earnestly recommended a union of minds and affections among her people: she observed, that some persons had endeavored to foment animosities, and even suggested in print that the established church was in danger: she affirmed that such people were enemies to her and to the kingdom, and meant only to cover designs which they durst not publicly own, by endeavoring to distract the nation with unreasonable and groundless distrusts and jealousies: she declared she would always affectionately support and countenance the church of England, as by law established; that she would inviolably maintain the toleration, that she would promote religion and virtue, encourage trade, and every thing else that might make them a happy and flourishing people.

41. The majority in both houses now professed the same principles, and were well disposed to support the queen in all her designs: they first presented the usual addresses in the warmest terms of duty and affection: then the commons drew up a second, assuring her they would, to the utmost of their power, assist her in bringing the treaty of union to a happy conclusion: they desired that the proceedings of the last session of parliament, relating to the union and succession, might be laid before the house: the lords had solicited the same satisfaction, and her majesty promised to comply with their request. The lower house having heard and decided in some cases of controverted elections, proceeded to take into consideration the estimates for the service of the ensuing year, and granted the supplies without hesitation: in the house of lords, while the queen was present, lord Haversham, at the end of a long speech, in which he reflected on the conduct of the duke of Marlborough both on the Moselle and in Brabant, moved for an address to desire her majesty would invite the presumptive heir to the crown of England to come and reside in the kingdom: this motion was earnestly supported by the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Rochester, Nottingham, and Anglesea: they said there was no method so effectual to secure the succession, as that of the successor's being on the spot, ready to assume and maintain his or her right against any pretender; and they observed, that in former times, when the throne of England was vacant, the first comer had always succeeded in his pretensions. The proposal was vehemently opposed by the whigs, who knew it was disagreeable to the queen, whom they would not venture to disoblige: they argued, that a rivalry between the two courts might produce distractions, and be attended with very ill consequences ; and observed, that the princess Sophia had expressed a full satisfaction in the assurances of the queen, who had promised to maintain her title : the question being put, was carried in the negative by a great majority : the design of the tories in making this motion was to bring the other party into disgrace either with the queen or with the people : their joining in the measure would have given umbrage to their sovereign ; and, by opposing it, they ran the risk of incurring the public odium, as enemies to the protestant succession : but the pretence of the tories was so thin, the nation saw through it ; and the sole effect the motion produced was the queen's resentment against the whole party. Burnet, bishop of Sarum, proposed that provision might be made for maintaining the public quiet in the interval between the queen's decease and the arrival of her successor : the motion was seconded by the lord treasurer, and a bill brought in for the better security of her majesty's person and government, and of the succession to the crown of England : by this act a regency was appointed of the seven persons that should possess the offices of archbishop of Canterbury, lord chancellor or lord keeper, lord treasurer, lord president, lord privy-seal, lord high-admiral, and the lord chief justice of the queen's-bench : their business was to proclaim the next successor through the kingdom of England, and join with a certain number of persons named as regents by the successor, in three lists, to be sealed up and deposited with the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord keeper, and the minister residentiary of Hanover. It was enacted, that these joint regencies should conduct the administration ; that the last parliament, even though dissolved, should re-assemble, and continue sitting for six months after the decease of her majesty. The bill met with a warm opposition from the tories, and did not pass the upper house without a protest : it was still farther obstructed in the house of commons even by some of the whig party, who were given to understand that the princess Sophia had expressed an inclination to reside in England : exceptions were likewise taken to that clause in the bill, enacting that the last parliament should be re-assembled : they affirmed, that this was inconsistent with part of the act by which the succession was at first settled ; for, among other limitations, the parliament had provided, that when the crown should devolve to the house of Hanover, no man, who had either place or pension, should be capable of sitting in the house of commons. After tedious disputes and zealous altercations, they agreed that a certain number of offices should be specified as disqualifying places : this self-denying clause and some other amendments produced conferences between the two houses, and at length the bill passed by their mutual assent. Lord Haversham moved for an inquiry into the miscarriages of the last campaign, hoping to find some foundation for censure in the conduct of the duke of Marlborough ; but the proposal was rejected as invidious ; and the two houses presented an address to the queen, desiring she would preserve a good correspondence among all the confederates : they likewise concurred in repealing the act by which the Scots had been alienated and all the northern counties alarmed with the apprehension of a rupture between the two nations. Lord Shannon and brigadier Stanhope arriving with an account of the expedition to Catalonia, the queen communicated the good news in a speech to both houses, expressing her hope that they would enable her to prosecute the advantages which her arms had acquired : the commons were so well pleased with the tidings, that they forthwith granted £250,000 for her majesty's proportion in the expense of prosecuting the successes already gained by king Charles III. for the recovery of the monarchy of Spain to the house of Austria. On the fifteenth of November, the queen gave the royal assent to an act for exhibiting a bill to naturalise the princess Sophia and the issue of her body.

42. These measures being taken, the sixth of December was appointed for inquiring into those dangers to which the tories affirmed the church was exposed ; and the queen attended in person to hear the debates on this interesting subject. The earl of Rochester compared the expressions in the queen's speech at the beginning of the session to the law enacted in the reign of Charles II. denouncing the penalties of treason against those who should call the king a papist ; for which reason, he said, he always thought him of that persuasion : he affirmed that the church's danger arose from the act of security in Scotland, the absence of the successor to the crown, and the practice of occasional conformity : he was answered by lord Halifax, who, by way of recrimination, observed that king Charles II. was a Roman catholic, at least his brother declared him a papist after his death ; that his brother and successor was a known Roman catholic, yet the church thought herself secure ; and those patriots who stood up in its defence were discountenanced and punished : nay, when the successor ascended the throne, and the church was apparently in the most imminent danger by the high-commission court and otherwise, the nation was then indeed generally alarmed ; and every body knew who sat in that court, and entered deeply into the measures which were then pursued. Compton, bishop of London, declared that the church was in danger from profaneness, irreligion, and the licentiousness of the press : he complained that sermons were preached wherein rebellion was countenanced, and resistance to the higher powers encouraged : he alluded to a sermon preached before the lord-mayor, by Mr. Hoadley, now bishop of Winchester. Burnet, of Sarum, said, the bishop of London was the last man who ought to complain of that sermon ; for if the doctrine it contained was not good, he did not know what defence his lordship could make for his appearing in arms at Nottingham : he affirmed the church would be always subject to profaneness and irreligion, but that they were not now so flagrant as they usually had been : he said the society set up for reformation in London, and other cities, had contributed considerably to the suppression of vice : he was sure the corporation for propagating the Gospel had done a great deal towards instructing men in religion, by giving great numbers of books in practical divinity ; by erecting libraries in country parishes ; by sending many able divines to the foreign plantations, and founding schools to breed up children in the christian knowledge ; though to this expense very little had been contributed by those who appeared so wonderfully zealous for the church. The archbishop of York expressed his apprehension of danger from the increase of dissenters, particularly from the many academies they had instituted ; he moved, that the judges might be consulted with respect to the laws that were in force against such seminaries, and by what means they might be suppressed. Lord Wharton moved, that the judges might also be consulted about means of suppressing schools and seminaries held by nonjurors, in one of which the sons of a noble lord in that house had been educated : to this sarcasm the archbishop replied, that his sons were indeed taught by Mr. Ellis, a sober, virtuous man ; but that when he refused the oath of abjuration, they were immediately withdrawn from his instructions. Lord Wharton proceeded to declare, that he had carefully perused a pamphlet entitled The Memorial, which was said to contain a demonstratio-

that the church was in danger; but all he could learn was, that the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Rochester and Nottingham, were out of place: that he remembered some of these noblemen sat in the high-commission court, and then made no complaint of the church's being in danger. Patrick, bishop of Ely, complained of the heat and passion manifested by the gentlemen belonging to the universities, and of the undutiful behavior of the clergy towards their bishops: he was seconded by Hough, of Lichfield and Coventry, who added, that the inferior clergy calumniated their bishops, as if they were in a plot to destroy the church, and had compounded to be the last of their order. Hooper, of Bath and Wells, expatiated on the invidious distinction implied in the terms 'high-church,' and 'low-church.' The duke of Leeds asserted that the church could not be safe without an act against occasional conformity. Lord Somers recapitulated all the arguments which had been used on both sides of the question: he declared his own opinion was, that the nation was happy under a wise and just administration; that for men to raise groundless jealousies at that juncture, could mean no less than an intention to embroil the people at home, and defeat the glorious designs of the allies abroad. The debate being finished, the question was put, whether the church of England was in danger, and carried in the negative by a great majority: then the house resolved, that the church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extremest danger by king William III. of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and that whoever goes about to suggest or insinuate that the church is in danger, under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom: next day the commons concurred in this determination, and joined the lords in an address to the queen, communicating this resolution, beseeching her to take effectual measures for making it public; and also for punishing the authors and spreaders of the seditious and scandalous reports of the church's being in danger: she accordingly issued a proclamation, containing the resolution of the two houses, and offering a reward for discovering the author of The Memorial of the Church of England, and for apprehending David Edwards, a professed papist, charged on oath to be the printer and publisher of that libel.

43. After a short adjournment, a committee of the whole house presented the thanks of the commons to the duke of Marlborough for his great services performed to her majesty and the nation in the last campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with her allies : this nobleman was in such credit with the people, that when he proposed a loan of £500,000 to the emperor on a branch of his revenue in Silesia, the money was advanced immediately by the merchants of London : the kingdom was blessed with plenty ; the queen was universally beloved ; the people in general were zealous for the prosecution of the war ; the forces were well paid ; the treasury was punctual ; and though a great quantity of coin was exported for the maintenance of the war, the paper-currency supplied the deficiency so well, that no murmurs were heard, and the public credit flourished both at home and abroad : all the funds being established, one in particular for £2,500,000 by way of annuities for ninety-nine years, at six and a half per cent. and all the bills having received the royal assent, the queen went to the house of peers on the nineteenth of March, where, having thanked both houses for the repeated instances of their affection which she had received, she prorogued the parliament to the twenty-first of May following.<sup>5</sup> The new convocation, instead of imitating the union and harmony of the parliament, revived the divisions by which the former had been distracted, and the two houses seemed to act with more determined rancor against each other : the upper house having drawn up a warm address of thanks to the queen for her affectionate care of the church, the lower house refused to concur ; nor would they give any reason for their dissent : they prepared another in a different strain, which was rejected by the archbishop : then they agreed to divers resolutions, asserting their right of having what they offered to the upper house received by his grace and their lordships :<sup>6</sup> in consequence of this dissension the address was dropped, and a stop put to all farther communication between the two houses : the dean of Peterborough protested against the irregularities of the lower house. The queen, in a letter to the archbishop, signified her resolution to maintain her supremacy, and the due subordination of presbyters to bishops : she expressed her hope that he and his suffragans would act conformably to her resolution, in which case they might be assured of the continuance of her favor and protection : she required him to impart this declaration to the bishops and clergy, and to prorogue the convocation to such time as should appear most convenient. When he communicated this letter to the lower house, the members were not a little confounded; nevertheless, they would not comply with the prorogation, but continued to sit in defiance of her majesty's pleasure.

44. The eyes of Great Britain were now turned on a transaction of the utmost consequence to the whole island; namely, the treaty for a union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. [1706.] The queen having appointed the commissioners on both sides,<sup>7</sup> they met on the sixteenth of

April, in the council-chamber of the Cockpit near Whitehall, which was the place appointed for the conferences: their commissions being opened and read by the respective secretaries, and introductory speeches being pronounced by the lord keeper of England and the lord chancellor of Scotland, they agreed to certain preliminary articles, importing that all the proposals should be made in writing, and every point when agreed reduced to writing; that no points should be obligatory, till all matters should be adjusted in such a manner as would be proper to be laid before the queen and the two parliaments for their approbation; that a committee should be appointed from each commission, to revise the minutes of what might pass, before they should be inserted in the books by the respective secretaries; and that all the proceedings during the treaty should be kept secret. The Scots were inclined to a federal union, like that of the United Provinces; but the English were bent on an incorporation, so that no Scottish parliament should ever have power to repeal the articles of the treaty. The lord keeper proposed that the two kingdoms of England and Scotland should be for ever united into one realm, by the name of Great Britain; that it should be represented by one and the same parliament; and that the succession of this monarchy, failing of heirs of her majesty's body, should be according to the limitations mentioned in the act of parliament passed in the reign of king William, entitled 'an act for the farther limitation of the crown, and the better securing the rights and liberties of the subject.' The Scottish commissioners, in order to comply in some measure with the popular clamor of their nation, presented a proposal, implying that the succession to the crown of Scotland should be established on the same persons mentioned in the act of king William's reign; that the subjects of Scotland should for ever enjoy all the rights and privileges of the natives in England, and the dominions thereunto belonging; and that the subjects of England should enjoy the like rights and privileges in Scotland; that there should be a free communication and intercourse of trade and navigation between the two kingdoms, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, contrary to the terms of this union, should be repealed : the English commissioners declined entering into any considerations on these proposals, declaring themselves fully convinced that nothing but an intire union could settle a perfect and lasting friendship between the two kingdoms : the Scots acquiesced in this reply, and both sides proceeded in the treaty, without any other intervening dispute : they were twice visited by the queen, who exhorted them to accelerate the articles of a treaty that would prove so advantageous to both kingdoms. At length, they were finished, arranged, and mutually signed on the twenty-second of July, and next day presented to her majesty, at the palace of St. James's, by the lord keeper, in the name of the English commissioners : at the same time a sealed copy of the instrument was likewise delivered by the lord chancellor of Scotland ; and each made a short oration on the subject, to which the queen returned a very gracious reply : that same day she dictated an order of council, that whoever should be concerned in any discourse or libel, or in laying wagers relating to the union, should be prosecuted with the utmost rigor of the law.

45. In this famous treaty it was stipulated, that the succession to the united kingdom of Great Britain should be vested in the princess Sophia and her heirs, according to the acts already passed in the parliament of England ; that the united kingdom should be represented by one and the same parliament ; that all the subjects of Great Britain should enjoy a communication of privileges and advantages ; that they should have the same allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks, and be under the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations with respect to commerce and customs ; that Scotland should not be charged with the temporary duties on some certain commodities ; that the sum of £398,085. 10s., should be granted to the Scots, as an equivalent for such parts of the customs and excise charged on that kingdom, in consequence of the union, as would be applicable to the payment of the debts of England, according to the proportion which the customs and excise of Scotland bore to those of England : that, as the revenues of Scotland might increase, a farther equivalent should be allowed for such proportion of the said increase as should be applicable to the payment of the debts of England ; that the sum to be paid at present, as well as the money arising from the future equivalents, should be employed in reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of the English coin; in paying off the capital stock and interest due to the proprietors of the African company, which should be immediately dissolved; in discharging all the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland; in promoting and encouraging manufactures and fisheries, under the direction of commissioners to be appointed by her majesty, and accountable to the parliament of Great Britain: that the laws concerning public right, policy, and civil government should be the same throughout the whole united kingdom; but no alteration should be made in laws which concerned private right, except for evident utility of the subjects within Scotland; that the court of session, and all other courts of judicature in Scotland, should remain as then constituted by the laws of that kingdom, with the same authority and privileges as before the union, subject nevertheless to such regulations as should be made by the parliament of Great Britain; that all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life, should be reserved to the owners, as rights and property, in the same manner as then enjoyed by the laws of Scotland; that the rights and privileges of the royal boroughs in Scotland should remain intire after the union; that Scotland should be represented in the parliament of Great Britain by sixteen peers and forty-five commoners, to be elected in such a manner as should be settled by the present parliament of Scotland; that all peers of Scotland, and the successors to their honors and dignities, should, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and should have rank and precedence next and immediately after the English peers of the like orders and degrees at the time of the union, and before all peers of Great Britain of the like orders and degrees, who might be created after the union; that they should be tried as peers of Great Britain, and enjoy all privileges of peers, as fully as enjoyed by the peers of England, except the right and privilege of sitting in the house of lords, and the privileges depending thereon, and particularly the right of sitting on the trials of peers; that the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and registers whatsoever, should still remain as they were, within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, so far as they might be consistent with the terms of these articles, should cease and be declared void by the respective parliaments of the two kingdoms.

Such is the substance of that treaty of union which was so eagerly courted by the English ministry, and proved so unpalatable to the generality of the Scottish nation.
